(7) Some wise men also judge, that his drift covertly conveyed, lacked not in helping forth his brother Clarence to his death; which he resisted openly, howbeit somewhat (as men deemed) more faintly, then he that was hartily minded to his wealth: And they that thus judge, thinke that long time in King Edwards life, he fore-cast to be King, in case that his brother (whose life he looked that evill dyet should shorten) should happen to decease (as indeed he did) while his children were young. And they deeme that for this intent hee was glad of the Duke of Clarence death, whose life must needes have hindered him so intending, (being his elder brother) whether the same Duke had kept him true to his Nephew the young King, or enterprized to be King himselfe. But of all this point there is no certainty, and who so divineth upon conjectures, may aswell shoote too farre as too short. Howbeit this have I by credible information learned, that in the same night in which King Edward dyed, one Mistlebroke (long ere morning) came in great haste to the house of one Pottier dwelling in Red-Crosse street without Creeple-gate in London: and when he with hasty rapping, quickly was let in, he shewed unto Pottier that King Edward was departed. By my troth man quoth Pottier, then will my master the Duke of Glocester be King: What cause he had so to thinke, hard it is to say, whether being toward him hee knew any such thing intended, or otherwise had any inkling thereof, for it was not likely that he spake it of no ground.

(8) But now to returne to the course of this Historie; were it that the Duke of Glocester had of old forminded this conclusion, and was now thereunto moved, and put in hope by the occasion of the tender age of the yong Princes his Nephewes (as opportunity & likelyhood of speed putteth a man in courage of that hee never intended) certaine it is, that hee contrived their destruction, with the usurpation of the regall dignity upon himselfe, and forasmuch as hee well wist, and holpe to maintaine a long continued grudge and heart-burning betweene the Queenes kindred, and the Kings bloud, either part envying others authority; hee now thought their divisions should be (as it was indeed) a forward beginning to the pursuit of his intent, and a sure ground for the foundation of all his building: if he might first, under the pretext of revenging old displeasure, abuse the anger and ignorance of the one party, to the destruction of the other; and then winne to his purpose as many as he could, and those that could not be wonne, might be lost before they were aware; for of one thing was he certaine, that if his intent were perceived, he should soon have made peace betweene both the parties with his owne bloud.

The Vncle contriveth the destruction of his Nephewes.

(9) King Edward in his life, albeit that this dissention betweene his friends somewhat grieved him, yet in his good health he somewhat lesse regarded it, because hee thought whatsoever businesse should fall betweene them, himselfe should alwayes be able to rule both the parties. But in his last sickenesse, when hee perceived his naturall strength so fore infeebled, that he dispaired all recovery; then considering the youth of his Children, albeit he nothing lesse mistrusted then that that happened, yet well fore-seeing how many harmes might grow by their debate, while the youth of his Children should lacke discretion of themselves, and good Counsell of their friends, of which either party should counsell for their owne commodity, and the rather by pleasant advise to winne themselves favour, then by profitable advertisements to doe his Children good: hee called some of them before him that were at variance, and in speciall the Lord Marquesse Dorset, the Queenes Sonne by her first Husband, and William Lord Hastings a Nobleman, then Lord Chamberlain against whom the Queene especially grudged, for the great favour the King bare him: and also for that shee thought him secretly familiar with the King in wanton company. Her kindred also bare him fore, aswell for that the King had made him Captaine of Calais, which office the Lord Rivers, brother to the Queene

The crafty complaints of Richard Duke of Glocester.

The Queenes jealousie against the Lord Chamberlaine.

Queene claimed of the Kings former promise, as for divers other great gifts which hee received, that they looked for. These were the grudges which the King on his death-bed fought to remove, and they in shew seemed to cancell, as we have said, though the sparks of these displeasures burst afterward into a dangerous flame, which consumed most of them, as afterward shall appeare.

(10) For assoone as the King was departed this life, his Sonne Prince Edward drew towards London from Ludlow in Wales, which Countrey being farre off from the law, and recourse to justice, was become to be farre out of Order, and growne wilde; Robbers, Rovers, walking at liberty uncorrected: for which cause this Prince in the life time of his Father was sent thither, to the end that the authority of his presence should refraine evill-disposed persons, from the boldnesse of their former outrages. To the governance and ordering of this young Prince at his sending thither, was there appointed Sir Anthony Woodvill Lord Rivers, brother unto the Queene, a right honourable man, as valiant of hand as politick in Counsell; adjoyned were there unto him others of the same party, and in effect every one as he was neerest of kin unto the Queene, so was he planted next about the Prince.

The effect that his policy wrooke.

(11) That drift of the Queene, not unwisely devised, whereby her bloud might of youth be rooted in the Princes favour, the Duke of Glocester turned unto their destruction, and upon that ground set the foundation of all his unhappy fabricke. For whomsoever hee perceived either at variance with them, or bearing himselfe, their favour, he brake unto them; some by mouth, some by writing and secret messengers, that it was neither reason, nor in any wise to be suffered, that the young King their Master and kinseman, should be in the hands and Custody of his mothers kindred, sequestred in manner from their Company and attendance, of which every one ought him as faithfull service as they, and many of them farre more honourable part of kin then his mothers side: whose bloud (quoth he) saving the Kings pleasure, was farre unmeet to bee matched with his, which now to be as who say removed from the king, and the lesse noble to be left about him, is (quoth hee) neither honourable to his Majestie nor unto us, and also to his Grace no surety, to have the mightiest of his friends from him, and unto us no little jeopardy, to suffer our well-proved evill-willers to grow in over-great authoritie with the Prince in youth, who is light of belieefe and soone perswaded. Ye remember I trow, K. Edward himselfe, albeit he was a man of age and discretion, yet was he in many things ruled by the bend, more then stood either with his honour, or our profit, or with the commodity of any man else, except onely the immoderate advancement of themselves. Which whether they sorer thirsted after their owne weale, or our woe, it were hard I weene to gesse, and if some folkes friendship had not held better place with the King, then any respect of kindred, they might perhaps easily have intrapped and brought some of us to confusion ere this; why not as easily as they have done some other already, as neere of his royall bloud as wee? But our Lord hath wrought his will, and thankes be to his grace, that perill is past: howbeit as great is growing, if we suffer this young King in our enemies hand, which without his knowledge might abuse the name of his commandement, to any of our undoing, which thing God and good provision forbid.

Another crafty policy of Duke Richard.

(12) Of which good provision none of us hath any thing the lesse needs, for the late made attonement, in which the Kings pleasure had more place then the parties wils: nor none of us, I beleeve, is so unwise over-soone to trust a new friend made of an old foe, or to thinke that an hourely kindnes, sodainly contracted in one houre, continued yet scarce a fortnight, should be deeper setled in their stomackes, then a long accustomed malice many yeares rooted.

The conclusion of his designes.

With these words and writings and such other, the Duke of Glocester soone set a fire them that were of themselves apt enough to kindle, especially two, Edward Duke of Buckingham, and William Lord Hastings Chamberlaine, both men of honor, and of great power. The one by long succession from his Auncestry: the other by his office, and the Kings favour. These two not bearing each to other so much love, as both of them hatred unto the Queenes part, in this point accorded together, with the Duke of Glocester, that they would utterly remove from the Kings Company all his mothers friends under the name of their enemies.

The Queene yeeldeth to the Dukes perswasion.

(13) Vpon this conclusion the Duke of Glocester understanding that the Lords, which at that time were about the King, intended to bring him to London to his Coronation, accompanied with such power of their friends, that it should be hard for him to bring his purpose to passe, without the gathering a great assembly of people, and in manner of open warre, whereof the end he wist well was doubtfull, and in which the King being on their side, his part should have the face and name of a Rebellion; he secretly therefore, by divers meanes, caused the Queene to be perswaded and brought in mind, that it neither were need, and also should be jeopardous, the King to come up strong.

The Lords assemble at Northampton.

(14) For whereas now every Lord loved other, and no other thing studied upon but about the Coronation and honour of the King: if the Lords of her kindred should assemble in the Kings name much people, they should give the Lords of the contrary faction cause to feare and suspect, lest they should gather this people, not for the Kings safegard, whom no man impugned, but for their destruction, having more regard to their olde variance, then their new attonement: for which cause they should assemble on the other party much people againe for their defence, whose power she wist well stretched farre: and thus should all the Realme fall on an uproare: and of all the hurt that thereof should ensue, which was likely not to be a little, and the most harme like to fall where the least would, all the world would put her and her kindred in the blame, and say that they had unwisely and untruely also broken the amity and peace which the King her husband so prudently made betwixt his kin and hers on his death-bed, and which the other party faithfully observed.

The Keyes of Inne kept by Richard Duke of Glocester.

(15) The Queene in this wise perswaded, sent such word unto her sonne; and unto her brother, being about the King: besides, the Duke of Glocester himselfe, and other Lords, the chiefe of his bend, wrote unto the King so reverently, and to the Queenes friends there so lovingly, that they nothing earthly mistrusting, brought up the King in great haft, but not in good speed, with a faber company. Now was the King in his way to London, gone from Northampton, when the Dukes of Glocester and Buckingham came thither, where remained behinde, the Lord Rivers the Kings uncle, intending on the morrow to follow the King, and be with him at Stony-Stratford, twelve miles thence, earely ere he departed. So was there made that night much friendly cheere betwixt these two Dukes and the Lord Rivers a great while: but incontinent after that they were openly with great curtesie departed, and the Lord Rivers lodged, the Dukes secretly with a few of their most privy friends, set them downe in Councell, wherein they spent a great part of the night: and at their rising, in the dawning of the day, they sent our privily to their servants in their Innes and lodgings about, giving command to make themselves shortly ready, for their Lords were to horse-ward: upon which messages, many of their folke were attendant, when many of the L. Rivers servants were unready.

(16) Now had these Dukes taken into their custodies the keyes of the Inne, that none should passe forth without their license: and besides this, in the high-way towards Stony-Stratford, where the King lay, they had bestowed certaine of their men, that should send backe againe, and compell to returne any man that were gotten out of Northampton towards Stony-Stratford, till they had further order: forasmuch as the Dukes themselves intended, for the shew of their diligence, to bee the first that should that day attend upon the Kings Highnesse out of that Towne. Thus bare they folke in hand: but when the Lord Rivers understood the gates closed, the wayes beset, neither his servants, or himselfe suffered to goe out, considering well so great a thing without his knowledge, could not bee done for nought; and comparing this present manner with his last nights cheare, in so few houres to have so great a change, marvailously misliked it. Howbeit, sith hee could not get away, nor keepe himselfe close, hee would not, lest hee should seeme to hide himselfe for some secret feare of his own fault, wherof hee saw no such cause in himselfe: hee determined upon the surety of his owne conscience, to goe boldly unto them, and to enquire what this matter might meane; whom as soone as they saw, they beganne to quarrell with, saying, that hee entended to set distance betweene the King and them, and to bring them to confusion, but it should not lie in his power. And when he began (as he was a very well spoken man) in seemely wise to excuse himselfe, they tarried not the end of his answere, but shortly tooke him, and put him in ward: and that done, forthwith went to horse-backe, and tooke the way to Stony-Stratford, where they found the King with his Company, ready to leape on horse-backe, and depart forward to leave that lodging for them, because it was too strait for both companies.

The Lord Riuers much troubled at the sodaine action.

(17) And as soone as they came in his presence, they alighted downe with all their company about them; to whom the Duke of Buckingham said, Goe afore Gentlemen, and Yeomen keepe your roomes. In which goodly array they came to the King, and on their knees in very humble manner saluted his Grace, who received them in very joyous and amiable manner, nothing knowing, nor mistrusting as yet what was done. But even by and by in his presence, they picked a quarrell to the Lord Gray, the Kings other brother by his mother, saying, that he with the Lord Marquesse his brother, and the Lord Rivers his Vncle, had compassed to rule the King and the realm, and to set variance among the States, and to subdue and destroy the noble bloud of the Realme: towards the accomplishing whereof, they said that the Lord Marquesse had entred into the Tower of London, and thence taken out the Kings Treasure, and had sent men to the sea: All which things these Dukes well knew were done for necessary and good purposes, by the whole Councell at London, saving that somewhat they must say.

The Dukes come to the King.

(18) Vnto which words the King answered, what my brother Marquesse hath done I cannot say: but in good sooth I dare well answere for mine Vncle Rivers, and my brother here, that they are innocent of any such matter: yea my Liege, quoth the Duke of Buckingham, they have kept the dealings of these matters farre from the knowledge of your good Grace. And forthwith they arrested the Lord Richard, Sir Thomas Vaughan, and Sir Richard Haut knights, in the Kings presence, and brought the King and all his company backe unto Northampton, where they tooke againe further councell. And there they sent away from the King whom it pleased them, and set new servants about him, such as better liked them then him: At which dealing the King wept, and was nothing content; but it booted not: and at dinner the Duke of Glocester sent a dish from his owne Table to the Lord Rivers, bidding him be of good cheere, for all should be well. But the Lord Rivers thanking the Duke, prayed the Messenger to beare it to the Lord Richard, with the same message for his comfort, as one to whom such adversity was strange, but himselfe had beene all his dayes inured therewith, and therefore could beare it the better: but for all this comfortable courtesie of the Duke of Glocester, he sent the Lord Rivers, and the Lord Richard, with Sir Thomas Vaughan, into the North Country, into divers places to prison, and afterward all to Pomfret, where they were in conclusion beheaded.

(19) In this wise the Duke of Glocester tooke upon himselfe the Order and Governance of the young King, whom with much honour and humble reverence hee convaied towards London. But anone the tydings of this matter came hastily to the Queene, a little before the midnight following, and that in the forest wise, that the King her sonne was taken, her brother, her Sonne, and other friends arrested, and sent no man wist whither, to be done with God wot what. With which tidings, the Queene in great fright and heavinesse, bewailed her childs raigne, her friends mischance, and her owne misfortune, damning the time that ever she diswaded the gathering of power about the King, got her selfe in all hast possible with her young sonne, and her daughters, out of the Palace of Westminster, in which she then lay, into the Sanctuary, lodging her selfe and company there in the Abbots place.

(20) Now came there one likewise, not long after night from the Lord Chamberlaine, unto the Archbishop of Yorke then Chancellor of England, to his place not farre from Westminster; and for that he shewed his servants, that hee had tidings of great importance, that his M. gave him in charge, not to forbeare his rest, they letted not to awake him; nor hee to admit the Messenger unto his bed-side. Of whom hee heard that these Dukes were gone backe with the Kings Grace from Stony-Stratford unto Northampton: notwithstanding Sir (quoth he) my Lord sendeth your Lordship word, that there is no feare: for hee assureth you that all shall bee well. I assure him (quoth the Archbishop) bee it as well as it will, it will never bee so well as we have seene it. And thereupon by and by after the messengers departure, hee caused in all hast all his servants to be called up, and so with his owne household about him, every man weaponed, he tooke the Great Seale with him, and came yet before day unto the Queene. About whom hee found much heavinesse, rumble, haste and businesse, carriage and conveiance of her stuffe into Sanctuary, chests, coffers, packes and fardels, trussed all on mens backes, no man un-occupied, some lading, some going, some discharging, some comming for more, some breaking downe the wals to bring in the next way, and some drew to them to helpe to carry a wrong way. The Queene her selfe sate alone alow on the rushes, all desolate and dismayed, whom the Archbishop comforted in the best manner he could, shewing her that he trusted the matter was nothing so fore as she tooke it for, and that hee was put in good hope and out of feare, by a message sent him from the Lord Chamberlaine: Ah woe worth him (quoth the Queene) hee is one of them that laboureth to destroy me and my bloud.

(21) Madam (quoth hee) bee of good cheare; for I assure you, if they crowne any other King then your sonne, whom they have now with them, we shal on the morrow crowne his brother, whom you have here with you: and heere is the Great Seale, which in like fort as that noble Prince your Husband delivered it unto mee, so here I deliver it unto you, to the use and behoofe, of your Sonne, and therevvith hee betooke her the Great Seale, and departed home againe, even in the dawning of the day: by vvhich time hee might in his Chamber vvindovv see all the Thames full of boats of the Dukes of Glocesters servants, vvatching that no man should goe to Sanctuary, nor none should passe vnsearched. Then vvas there great commotion and murmure, as vvell in other places about, as especially in the City, the people diversly diversly divining upon this dealing. And some Lords, Knights and Gentlemen, either for favour of the Queene, or for feare of themselves, assembled in sundry Companies, and went flocke-meale in harnesse: and many also, for that they accounted this deuenaour attempted, nor so specially against the other Lords, as against the King himselfe in the disturbance of his Coronation.

Great feare conceived of the ouermuch mustering made.

(22) But then, by and by the Lords assembled together, towards which meeting, the Archbishoppe of Yorke fearing that it would bee ascribed (as it was indeed) to his overmuch lightnesse, that hee so sodainely had yeelded up the great Seale to the Queene (to whom the custody thereof nothing appertained) without speciall commandement of the King, secretely sent for the Seale againe, and brought it with him after the accustomed manner. And at this meeting the Lord Hastings, whose truth toward the King no man doubted, nor needed to doubt, perswaded the Lords to beleeve, that the Duke of Glocester was sure and fastly faithfull to his Prince, and that the Lord Rivers, and Lord Richard, with the other Knight, were for matters attempted by them against the Dukes of Glocester and Buckingham put under arrest for their surety, not for the Kings jeopardy; and that they were also in safeguard, and there no longer should remaine, then till the matter were, not by the Dukes onely, but also by all the other Lords of the Kings Councell indifferently examined, and by other discretions ordered, either judged or appeased. But one thing he advised them beware, that they judged not the matter too farre forth ere they knew the truth, nor turning their private grudges into the common hurt, irking and provoking men unto anger; and disturbing the kings Coronation; towards which the Dukes were comming up, that they might peraventure bring the matter so farre out of joynt, that it should never be brought in frame againe. Which strife if it should happen (as it were likely) to come to a field, though both parties were in all things equall, yet should the authority be on that side where the King is himselfe.

Lord Hastings fauorable disimuleth.

(23) With these perswasions of the Lord Hastings, whereof part himselfe beleeved, of part he wift the contrary, these commotions were somewhat appeased, but especially by that, that the Dukes of Glocester and Buckingham were so neere, and came so shortly on with the King, in none other manner, with none other voice, or any other semblance then to his Coronation; causing the fame to be blowne about, that these Lords and Knights which were taken, had contrived the destruction of the Dukes of Glocester and Buckingham, and of other the Noble bloud of the Realme, to the end that themselves would alone demeane and governe the King at their pleasure. And for the colourable proofe thereof, such of the Dukes servants as rode with the Carts of their stuffe that were taken (amongst which stuffe no marvell though some were harnesse, which at the breaking up of the household, must needs either be brought away, or cast away) they shewed unto the people all the way as they went; saying, loe here be the barrels of harnesse, that these Traitours have privily convaied in their Carriages to destroy the Noble Lords withall. This devise, albeit it made the matter to wisemen more unlikely, well perceiving that the inenders of such a purpose would rather have had their harnesse on their backes, then to bee bound up in barrels: yet much part of the common people were therewith very well satisfied, and said it were almes to hang them.

(24) When the King approached neere to the City, Edmund Shaw Goldsmith, then Major, with William White, and Iohn Matthew Sheriffes, and all the other Aldermen in Scarlet, with fiue hundred horse of the Citizens, in Violet, received him reverently at Harnesey, and riding from thence, accompanied him into the City, which he entred the fourth day of May, the first and last yeare of his raigne. The King was lodged in the Bishops Pallace, where was kept a great Councell, and there was sworne to the King the Duke of Glocester, the Duke of Buckingham, and all the Lords. But the Duke of Glocester bare him in open sight so reverently to the Prince, with all semblance of lowlinesse, that from the great obloquie in which he was so late before, hee was so dainly falne in so great trust, that at the Councell next assembled, he was made the onely man, chosen and thought most meet to be Protector of the King and his Realme, so that (were it destiny, or were it folly) the Lambe was beraken to the Wolfe to keepe. At which Councell also, the Archbishop of Yorke, Chancellor of England, which had deliverod up the great Seale to the Queene, was thereof greatly reproved, and the Seale taken from him, and delivered to Doctor Russell Bishop of Lincolne, a wise man, and of much experience, and undoubtedly one of the best learned men that England had in his time: divers Lords and Knights were appointed unto divers Roomes, the Lord Chamberlaine, and some others, keeping still their Offices they had before.

The great Seale taken from the Archbishop of Yorke.

(25) Now although that the Protector so fore thirsted for the finishing of those desigues which he had begun, and thought every day a yeare till they were atchieved, yet durst he no further attempt, so long as hee had but halfe his prey in his hand: well witting, that if hee depoied the one Brother, all the Realme would fall to the other, if he either remained in Sanctuary, or should be conveyed to his further liberty: wherefore, incontinent at the next meeting of the Lords in Councell, he propoied unto them, that it was a hainous deed of the Queene, and proceeded of great malice towards the Kings Counsellers, that she should keepe in Sanctuary the Kings Brother from him, whose speciall pleasure and comfort were to have his brother with him: and that by her done, was to none other intent, but to bring all the Lords in obloquie, and murmure of the people, as though they were not to be trusted with the Kings brother, who by assent of the Nobles of the land, were appointed as the Kings neerest friends, to the tuition of his owne royall person. The prosperity whereof standeth (quoth hee) not all in keeping from enemies or ill viand, but partly also in recreation, and moderate pleasure, which he in his tender youth cannot take in the company of ancient persons, but in the familiar conversation of those that be neither farre under, nor farre above his age, and nevertheless of estate convenient to accompany his noble Majesty; wherefore with whom rather, then with his owne brother? And if any man think this consideration vaine, (which I thinke no man thinketh that loveth the King) let him consider that sometimes without small things, greater cannot stand. And verily, it redoundeth greatly to the dishonour both of the Kings Highnesse, and of us all that are about his Grace, to have it runne in every mans mouth, not in this Realme onely, but also in other lands, (as evill words walke farre) that the Kings brother shall be faine to keepe Sanctuary; for every man I deeme, will suppose, that there is occation given, why it should so be: and such evill opinions once fastened in mens hearts, hardly can be screwed out againe, and may grow to more griefe then any man here can divine. Wherefore I thinke it were not the worst to send unto the Queene for the redresse of this matter, some honourable trusty man, such as both tendreth the Kings weale, and the honour of this Councell, and is also in favour and credence with her. For all which considerations, none seemeth to mee more meete, then is our reverend Father here present, my Lord Cardinall, who may in this matter doe most good of any man, if it please him to take the paines, which I doubt not of his goodnesse hee will not refuse, for the Kings sake and ours, and weale of the young Duke himselfe, the Kings most honourable brother, and after my Soveraigne himselfe, my most deere Nephew, considering that thereby shall be ceased the slanderous rumour and obloquie now going, and the hurts avoided that thereof might ensue, and much rest and quiet grow to all the Realme. And if she be perce se so obstinate, and so precisely fer upon her owne will, that neither his wife and faithfull advertisement cannot moove her, nor any mans reason content her: then shall we by mine advise, and by the Kings authority, fetch him out of that Prison, and bring him to his noble presence, in whose continuall company he shall be so well cherished, and so honourably intreated, that all the world shall to our honor, and her reproach perceive, that it was onely malice, frowardnesse, or folly, that caused her to keepe him there: this is my minde in this matter for this time, except any of your Lordships any thing perceive to the contrary, for never shall I by Gods grace, so wed my selfe to my owne will, but that I shall be ready to change it upon your better advises.

If the Queene re use to deliver the Duke what is to be done.

(26) When the Protector had said, all the Councell affirmed, that the morion was good and reasonable, and to the King and the Duke his brother honourable, and the thing that should cease great murmure in the Realme, if the mother might be by good meanes induced to deliver him. Which thing the Archbishop of Yorke, whom they all agreed also to be thereto most convenient, tooke upon him to move her, and therein to doe his uttermost endeavour: howbeit, if she could by no meanes be entreated with her good will to deliver him, then thought he, and such other of the Clergie then present, that it were not in any wise to be attempted, to take him out against her will. For it would be a thing that should turne to the great grudge of all men, and high displeasure of God, if the priviledge of that holy place should now be broken, which had so many yeares beene kept, which both Kings and Popes so good had granted, so many bad confirmed, and which holy ground was more then five hundred yeares agoe, by S. Peter in his owne person, in spirit accompanied with great multitude of Angels, by night so specially hallowed and dedicated to God, (for the proofe whereof, they have yet in the Abbey, Saint Peters Cope to shew) that from that time hitherward, was there never so undevout a King, that durst violate that sacred place, or so holy a Bishop, that durst presume to consecrate it; and therefore (quoth the Archbishop of Yorke) God forbid that any man should for any thing earthly, enterprize to breake the immunitie and liberty of that sacred Sanctuarie, that hath beene the safegard of many a good mans life: and I trust (quoth he) with Gods grace we shall not need it. But for what need soever, I would not we should doe it; I trust that she shall be with reason contented, and all things in good manner obtained, but if it happen that I bring it not so to passe, yet shall I toward it with my best, and you shall all well perceive, that there shall be of my indeavour no lacke, if the Mothers dread, and womanish feare be not the let.

(27) Womanish feare, nay womanish frowardnesse (quoth the Duke of Buckingham) for I dare take it upon my soule she will knoweth there is no need of any feare, either for her sonne, or for her selfe. For as for her, here is no man that will be at warre with a woman: Would God some of the men of her kin were women too, and then should all be soone in rest: Howbeit, there is none of her kin the lesse loved, for that they be of her kin, but for their owne evill-deserving. And nay the lesse, if we loved neither her, nor her kinne, yet were there no cause to thinke that we should hate the Kings noble brother, to whose Grace we our selves be of kin: whose honour, if she as much desired, as our dishonour, and as much regard tooke to his wealth, as to her owne will, she would be as loth to suffer him from the King, as any of us be. For, if she have wit, (as would God she had as good will as she hath shrewd wit) she reckoneth her selfe no wiser, then she thinketh some that be here, of whose faithfull minde she nothing doubteth, but verily beleeveth and knoweth, that they would be as sorry of his harme, as her selfe, and yet would have him from her, if she bide there: and we all (I thinke) content, that both be with her, if she come thence, and bide in such place, where they may be with their honour. Now then, if she refuse in the deliverance of him, to follow the councell of them, whose wisedome she knoweth, whose truth she well trusteth: it is easie to perceive, that frowardnesse letteth her, and not feare. But goe to, suppose that she feare, (as who may let her to feare her owne shadow:) the more she feareth to deliver him, the more ought we to feare to leave him in her hands: For, if she cast such fond doubts, that she feare his hurt; then will she feare that he shall be fetch thence. For she will soone thinke, that if men were set (which God forbid) upon so great a mischiefe, the Sanctuary would little let them: which good men might (as I thinke) without sin, somewhat lesse regard then they doe. Then, if she doubt, lest hee might be fetched from her, is it not likely that she shall send him somewhere out of the Realme? Verily, I looke for none other. And I doubt not, but she now as sore mindeth it, as we the let thereof. And if she might happen to bring that to passe (as it were no great mastery, we letting her alone) all the world would say, that we were a wise sort of Counsellors about a King, that suffer his brother to be cast away under our noses. And therefore I assure you faithfully for my minde, I will rather, maugre her mind, fetch him away, then leave him there, till her frowardnesse and fond feare convay him away. And yet will I breake no Sanctuary therefore: for verily, sith the priviledges of that place, and other-like have beene of long continued, I am not he that will goe about to breake them. And in good faith, if they were now to begin, I would not be he that should be about to make them. Yet will I not say nay, but that it is a deed of pitty, that such men, as the sea, or their evill debters have brought in poverty, should have some place of libertie, to keepe their bodies out of the danger of their cruell Creditors. And also, if the Crowne happen (as it hath done) to come in question, while either part taketh other as Traitours, I like well there be some places of refuge for both. But as for theeves, of which these places be full, and which never fall from the craft after they once fall thereunto; it is pittie the Sanctuary should serve them, and much more manquellers, whom God bad to take from the Altar and kill them, if their murther were wilfull. And where it is otherwise, there need wee not the Sanctuaries, that God appointed in the old Law: for if either necessity, his own defence, or misfortune draweth him to that deed, a pardon serveth, which either the law granteth of course, or the King of pitie may. Then looke we now how few sanctuary men there be, whom any favourable necessity compelled to goe thither; and then see on the other side, what a sort there be commonly therein of them, whom wilfull unthriftinesse hath brought to naught: what rabble of theeves, murtherers, and malicious hainous Traitors, and that in two places especially: the one at the elbow of the Citie, the other in the very bowels. I dare well avow it, weigh the good that they doe, with the hurt that commeth of them, and yee shall finde it much better to lacke both, then to have both. And this I say, although they were not abused as they now be, and so long have beene, that I feare me ever they will be, while men be afraide to set the hands to amend them, as though God and S. Peter were the patrons of ungracious living. Now unthrifts riot, and runne in debt, upon the boldnesse of these places; yea, and rich men runne thither with poore mens goods, there they build, there they spend, and bid their Creditors goe whistle. Mens wives runne thither with their husbands plate, and say, say, they dare not abide with their Husbands for beating. Theeves bring thither their stolne goods, and live thereon riotously: there they devise new robberies, nightly they steale out, they robbe and rive, kill and come in againe, as though those places gave them not only a safe-guard for the harme they have done, but a license also to doe more; howbeit much of this mischiefe, if Wisemen would set their hands to it, might be amended, with great thankes of God, and no breach of the Priviledge. The residue, sith so long agoe, I wot neere what Pope, and what Prince more pitteous then politique hath granted it, and other men since, of a certaine religious feare, have not broken it; Let us therefore take paine therewith, and let it a Gods name stand in force, as farre foorth as reason will, which is not fully so farre forth as may serve to let us of the fetching forth of this Nobleman, to his honour and wealth, out of that place, in which hee neither is, nor can be a Sanctuary man. A Sanctuary serveth alwayes to defend the body of that man that standeth in danger abroad, not of great hurt onely, but also of lawfull hurt; for against unlawfull harmes, never Pope nor King intended to Priviledge any one place, for that Priviledge hath every place: knoweth any man any place, wherein it is lawfull for one man to doe another wrong? that no man unlawfully take hurt, that liberty, the King, the Law, and very nature forbiddeth in every place, and maketh to that regard, for every man, every place a Sanctuary: but where a man is by lawfull meanes in perill, there needeth he the tuition of some speciall priviledge, which is the onely ground and cause of all Sanctuaries: from which necessitie this noble Prince is farre, whose love to the King, nature and kindred proveth: whose innocency to all the World, his tender youth proveth, and so Sanctuary, as for him, neither none hee needeth, nor none can he have. Men come not to Sanctuary, as they come to baptisme, to require it by their God-fathers; hee must aske it himselfe, that must have it; and reason, sith no man hath cause to have it, but whose conscience of his owne fault maketh him faine need to require it: what will then hath yonder Babe? which and if he had discretion to require it, if need were, I dare say would now be right angry with them that keepe him there: and I would thinke without any scruple of conscience, without any breach of priviledge, to be somewhat more homely with them, that be there Sanctuary-men indeed: for if one goe to Sanctuary with another mans goods, why should not the King, leaving his body at liberty, satisfie the party of his goods, even within the Sanctuary? for neither King nor Pope can give any place such a priviledge, that it shall discarge a man of his debts, being able to pay. And with that divers of the Clergie that were present, whether they said it for his pleasure, or as they thought, agreed plainely, that by the law of God, and of the Church, the goods of a Sanctuary-man, should be delivered in payment of his debts, and stolne goods to the owner, and onely liberty reserved him, to get his living with the labour of his hands. Verily (quoth the Duke) I think you say very truth; and what if a mans wife would take Sanctuary, because she list to runne from her Husband? I would weene if shee could alledge none other cause, hee may lawfully without any displeasure to Saint Peter, take her out of Saint Peters Church by the arme. And if no body may be taken out of Sanctuary, that faith he will bide there, then if a childe will take Sanctuary, because hee feareth to goe to Schoole, his Master must let him alone. And as simple as the sample is, yet is there lesse reason in our case then in that; for therein, though it be a childish feare, yet is there at the least-wise some feare, and herein is there none at all. And verily, I have often heard of Sanctuary-men; but I never heard earst of Sanctuary Children. And therefore, as for the Conclusion of my minde, who so my have deserved to neede it, if they thinke it for their surety, let them keepe it; but hee can be no Sanctuary-man that had neither wisedome to desire it, nor malice to deserve it, whose life or libertie, can by no lawfull processe stand in jeopardie: and he that taketh one out of the Sanctuary to doe him good, I say plainely that hee breaketh no Sanctuary.

The generall cruelty of them all.

(28) When the Duke had done, the temporall men wholly, and most part of the spirituall also, thinking no hurt earthly meane towards the young babe, condiscended in effect, that if hee were not delivered, hee should be fetched; howbeit they all thought it best, in the avoyding of all manner of rumour, that the Lord Cardinall should first assay to get him with her good will. And thereupon, all the Councell came unto the Starre-Chamber at Westminster, and the Lord Cardinall leaving the Protector with the Councell in the Starre-Chamber, departed into the Sanctuary to the Queene with divers other Lords with him, were it for the respect of his honour, or that she should by presence of so many perceive that this errand was not one mans mind: or were it, for that the Protector intended not in this matter to trust any one man alone, or else, that if shee finally were determined to keepe him, some of that Company had happily secret instructions, incontinent, maugre her minde to take him, and to leave her no respite to convey him, which shee was likely to minde, after this matter broken to her, if the time would in any wise serve her.

The Cardinall doth his errand to the Queen.

(29) When the Queene and those Lords were come together in presence, the Lord Cardinall shewed her, that it was thought unto the Protector, and unto the whole Counsell, that her keeping of the Kings brother in that place, was the thing which highly founded, not onely to the great rumour of the people, and their obloquie, but also to the importable griefe and displeasure of the Kings Royall Majestie, to whose Grace it were a singular comfort, to have his naturall brother in Company, as it was both his dishonour, all theirs, and hers also, to suffer him in Sanctuary, as though the one brother stood in danger and perill of the other. And hee shewed her, that the Counsell therefore had sent him to require her the delivery of the young Duke, that hee might bee brought unto the Kings presence at his liberty, out of that place, which they reckoned as a prison, and there hee should bee demeaned, according to his estate: and shee in this doing should both doe great good to the Realme, pleasure to the Councell, and profit to her selfe, succour to her friends that were in distresse; and besides that (which he wist well she specially tendred) not onely great comfort and honour to the King, but also the young Duke himselfe, whose great wealth it were to be together, as well for many greater causes, as also for both their disports and recreations; which thing the Lords esteemed not slight, though it seemed light; well pondering that their youth without recreation and play, cannot endure, nor any stranger, for the conjecture of both their ages and estates, so meet in that point for any of them, as either of them for other.

The Queene answers to the Cardinall.

(30) My Lord (quoth the Queene) I say not nay, but that it were very convenient, that this Gentleman whom yee require, were in company of the King his brother; and in good faith, I thinke it were as great commoditie to them both, for yet a while to bee in the custodie of their mother, the tender age confidered of the elder of them both, but specially the younger, which besides his Infancy, that also needeth good looking to, hath a while beene so sore diseased, vexed with sicknesse, and is so newly rather a little amended, then well recovered, that I dare put no person earthly in trust with his keeping but my selfe onely; confidering that there is (as Phyſitians ſay) and as we alſo finde, double the perill in the recidivation, that was in the firſt ſickeneſſe, with which diſeaſe, nature being ſore laboured, fore-wearied and weakened, waxeth the leſſe able to beare out and ſuſtaine a new ſurfeit. And albeit there might be found other that would happily doe their beſt unto him, yet is there none that either knoweth better how to order him, then I that ſo long have kept him, or is more like tenderly to cheriſh him then his owne mother that bare him.

Physitians

(31) No man denieth, good Madam (quoth the Cardinall) but that your Grace were of all others moſt neceſſary about your Children, and ſo would all the Councell not onely be content, but glad that you were, if it might ſtand with your pleaſure, to be in ſuch place as might ſtand with their honour: but if you doe appoint your ſelfe to tarry here, then they thinke it were more convenient that the Duke of Yorke were with the King, honourably at his liberty, to the comfort of them both, rather then here as a Sanctuary man, to both their diſhonour and obloquie, ſith there is not alwayes ſo great a neceſſitie to haue the childe with his mother, but that occaſion may ſometimes be ſuch, that it ſhould be more expedient to keepe him elſewhere, which well appeareth in this, that at ſuch time as your deareſt ſonne then Prince, and now King, ſhould for his honour, and good order of the Country keepe his reſidence in Wales, farre out of your company, your Grace was well contented therewith your ſelfe.

(32) Not very well contented (quoth the Queen) and yet the caſe is not like, for the one was then in health, and the other is now ſicke: in which caſe I marvell greatly, that my Lord Protector is ſo deſirous to have him in his keeping, where if the Childe in his ſickneſſe miſcarry by nature, yet might he runne into ſlander and ſuſpition of fraud. And where they call it a thing ſo fore againſt my Childes honour, and theirs alſo, that hee abideth in this place: it is all their honours there to ſuffer him abide, where no man doubteth he ſhall be beſt kept, and that is here, while I am here, which as yet intend not to come forth, and jeopard my ſelfe after other of my friends, which would God were rather here in ſurety with me, then I there in jeopardy with them.

(33) Why Madame (quoth another Lord) know you any thing why they ſhould be in jeopardy? Nay verily (quoth ſhee) nor why they ſhould be in Priſon, as now they be: But it is I trow no great marvaile though I feare, leſt thoſe that have not letted to put them in durance without colour, will let as little to procure their deſtruction without cauſe. The Cardinall made a countenance to the other Lord, that he ſhould harpe no more upon that ſtring, and then ſaid hee to the Queene, that hee nothing doubted, but that thoſe Lords of her honourable Kinne, which as yet remained under arreſt, ſhould upon the matter examined do well enough, and as towards her noble perſon, neither was, neither could be any jeopardy.

(34) Whereby ſhould I truſt that (quoth the Queene?) in that I am guilteſſe? as though they were guilty: in that I am with their enemies better loved then they? when they hate them for my ſake; in that I am ſo neere a kinne to the King? and how farre they be off, if that would helpe, as God grant it hurt not, and therefore as for me, I purpoſe not as yet to depart hence. And as for this Gentleman my ſonne, I minde that he ſhould be where I am, till I ſee further: for I aſſure you, for that I ſee ſome men ſo greedy, without any ſubſtantiall cauſe to have him, makes me much more fearefull to deliver him: Truely Madame (quoth he) the more unwilling that you be to deliver him, the more unwilling other men bee to ſuffer you to keepe him, leſt your cauſeleſſe feare might cauſe you farther to convey him: and many there be that thinke he can have no priviledge in this place, which neither can have will to aske it, nor malice to deſerve it; and therefore, they reckon no priviledge broken, though they fetch him out, which if you finally refuſe to deliver him, I verily thinke they will: ſo much dread hath my Lord his Vncle, for the tender love hee beareth him, leſt your Grace ſhould hope to ſend him away.

(35) Ah ſir, (quoth the Queene) hath the Protector ſo tender zeale that hee feareth nothing, but leſt he ſhould eſcape him? thinketh he that I would ſend him hence, which is not in plight to ſend out, and in what place could I account him ſure, if hee bee not ſure in the Sanctuary? which there was never Tyrant yet ſo divelliſh, that durſt preſume to breake. And I truſt God is as ſtrong now to withſtand his adverſaries, as ever he was. But my ſonne can deſerve no Sanctuary, and therefore he cannot have it. Forſooth hee hath found out a goodly gloſſe, by which that place that may defend a theefe, may not ſave an innocent: but he is in no jeopardy, nor hath no need thereof: would God he had not. Thinketh the Protector, (I pray God hee may proove a Protector) thinketh hee, that I perceive not whereunto his painted proceſſe draweth? It is not honourable that the Duke abide here: It were comfortable for them both, that hee were with his brother, becauſe the King lacketh a play-fellow forſooth. I pray God ſend them both better play-fellowes then him, that maketh ſo high a matter, upon ſo trifling pretext, as though there could none bee found to play with the King, but his brother, (that hath no liſt to play for ſickneſſe) come out of Sanctuary, out of his ſafe-guard to play with him. As though Princes, as yong as they be, could not play but with their Peeres, or children could not play but with their kindred, with whom for the moſt part they agree much worſe then with ſtrangers. But the Childe cannot require the priviledge: Who told him ſo? he ſhall heare him aske it, if he will. Howbeit, this is a gay matter, ſuppoſe hee could not aske it, ſuppoſe hee would not aske it, ſuppoſe hee would aske to goe out, if I ſay he ſhall not: If I aske the Priviledge but for my ſelfe, I ſay hee that taketh him out againſt my will, breaketh the Sanctuary. Serveth this liberty for my perſon onely, or for my goods alſo: you may not take hence my Horſe from me, and may you take my Childe from me? Healſo is my Ward: for as my learned Counſell ſheweth me, ſith he hath nothing by diſcent holden by Knights-ſervice, the law maketh his mother his Gardian. The may no man (I ſuppoſe) take my Ward from me out of Sanctuary, without the breach of Sanctuary. And if my priviledge could not ſerve him, nor hee aske it for himſelfe, yet ſith the Law committeth to me the cuſtody of him, I may require it for him, except the Law give a childe a Gardian onely for his goods and lands, diſcharging him of the cure and ſafe-keeping of his body, for which onely both lands and goods ſerve. And if examples be ſufficient, to obtaine Priviledge for my childe, I need not farre to ſeeke them, for in this place in which now we be (and which is now in queſtion, whether my childe may take benefit of it) mine other ſonne now King, was borne, kept in his Cradle, and preſerved to a more proſperous fortune, which I pray God long to continue. And as you all know, this is not the firſt time that I have taken Sanctuary. For when my Lord my Husband was baniſhed, and thruſt out of his Kingdome, I fled hither, being great with childe: and here I bare the Prince: and when my Lord my Husband returned ſafe againe, and had the victory, then went I hence, to welcome him home, & from thence I brought my Babe the Prince unto his Father, when he firſt tooke him in his Armes. And I pray God that my ſonnes Pallace may be as great a ſafe-guard unto him now reigning, as this place was ſometime to the Kings enemy. In which place I intend to keepe his brother, ſince mans law ſerveth the Gardian to keepe the Infant. The Law of Nature wils the Mother to keepe her her child, Gods law priviledgeth the Sanctuary, and the Sanctuary my ſonne, ſith I feare to put him in the Protectors hands, who hath his brother already, and were (if both failed) inheritor to the Crowne: and the cauſe of my feare, hath no man to doe to examine. But yet I feare no further then the Law feareth, which as learned men tell me, forbiddeth every man the cuſtody of them by whoſe death he may inherite leſſe land then a Kingdome. I can no more: but whoſoever he be that breaketh this holy Sanctuary I pray God ſhortly ſend him need of a Sanctuary when he may not come to it, for taken out of Sanctuary I would not that my mortall enemy were.

(36) The Lord Cardinall perceiving that the Queene waxed ever the longer the further off, and alſo that ſhee began to kindle and chaſe, and ſpeake more biting words againſt the Protector, and ſuch as he never beleeved, and was alſo loath to heare, he ſaid to her for a finall concluſion, that hee no longer would deſpure the matter, but if ſhe were content to deliver the Duke to him, and to the other Lords preſent, hee durſt lay his body and ſoule both in pledge, not onely for his ſurety, but alſo for his eſtate; And if ſhe would give a reſolute anſwere to the contrary, he would forthwith depart therewithall, and ſhift who ſo would with this buſineſſe afterward, for he never intended more to move her in that matter, in which ſhe thought that he and all others alſo, ſave her ſelfe lacked either wit or truth; wit, if they were ſo dull that they could perceive nothing what the Protector intended: truth, if they ſhould procure her ſonne to be delivered into his hands, in whom they ſhould perceive towards the childe any evill intended.

(37) The Queene with theſe words ſtood a good while in a deepe ſtudy. And for as much as to her ſeemed, the Cardinall ready to depart, and the Protector himſelfe ready at hand, ſo as ſhe verily thought ſhe could not keepe him there, but that he ſhould incontinent be taken thence, and to convey him elſewhere, neither had ſhe time to ſerve her, nor place determined, nor perſons appointed, all things unready, this meſſage came on her ſo ſodainely, nothing leſſe looked for, then to have him fetcht out of Sanctuary, which ſhee thought to be now beſet in ſuch places about, that he could not be conveyed out untaken, and partly (as ſhe thought) it might fortune her feare to be falſe, ſo wel ſhe wiſt it was either needleſſe or bootleſſe: Wherefore, if ſhee muſt needs goe from him, ſhe deemed it beſt to deliver him; and beſides the Cardinals faith, ſhe nothing doubted, neither ſome other Lords, whom ſhe ſaw there preſent, which as ſhe feared leſt they might be deceived, ſo was ſhee well aſſured they would not bee corrupted: and thought it would make them the more warily to looke to him, and the more circumſpectly to ſee to his ſurety, if with her owne hands ſhee be-tooke him to them of truſt. And laſtly, taking the young Duke by the hand, ſaid unto the Lord:

Queene eliz. yeeldeth to deliver the young Duke.

(38) My Lords, and all my Lords; I neither am ſo unwiſe to miſtruſt your wits, nor ſo ſuſpitious to miſtruſt your truths: of which thing I purpoſe to make you ſuch a proofe, as if either of both lacked in you, might both turne me to great ſorrow, the Realme to much harm, and you all to great reproach. For loe, here is (quoth ſhe) this Gentleman whom I doubt not, but I could here keepe ſafe if I would, whatſoever any man ſay: and I doubt not alſo, but there be ſome abroad ſo deadly enemies unto my blood, that if they wiſt where any of it lay in their owne bodies, they would let it out. Wee have alſo experience, that the deſire of a Kingdome knoweth no kindred: the brother hath beene the brothers bane: and may the Nephewes be ſure of their Vncle? Each of theſe children is the others defence, whileſt they are aſunder, and each of their lives lyeth in the others body: keepe one ſafe, and both be ſure, and nothing for them both more perillous, then to be in one place: For what wiſe Merchant adventureth all his goods in one Ship? All this notwithſtanding, I deliver him, and his brother in him, to keepe, into your hands, of whom I ſhall aske both, before God and the world. Faithfull ye be, that wot I well, and I know well ye be wiſe; power and ſtrength to keepe him, if ye liſt, neither lacke you of your ſelfe, nor lacke helpe in this caſe. And if you cannot elſewhere, then may you leave him here: but onely one thing, I beſeech you, for the truſt that his father ever put in you, and for the truſt I now put you in, that as farre as you thinke I feare too much, be you well wary that you feare not too little: and therewithall ſhe ſaid unto the Childe, Farewell mine owne ſweet ſon, God ſend you good keeping: let me kiſſe you yet once, ere you goe; for God knoweth when we ſhall kiſſe together againe. And therwithall ſhe kiſſed him, and bleſſed him, turned her backe and wept, and went her way, leaving the child weeping as faſt. When the Lord Cardinall, and thoſe other Lords with him, had received the young Duke, they brought him into the Star-Chamber, where the Protector tooke him in his armes, and kiſſed him, with theſe words: Now welcome my Lord, even with all my heart: In which ſaying, it is like he ſpake as hee thought. Thereupon forth-with they brought him unto the King his brother, into the Biſhops Palace at Pauls; and from thence both of them through the Citie of London, honourably attended into the Tower, out of which after that day they never came againe.

A fit of kiſſe.

(39) The Protector having both the Children now in his hands, opened himſelfe more boldly, both to certaine other men, and alſo chiefly to the Duke of Buckingham. Although I know that many thought that this Duke was privie to all the Protectors counſell, even from the beginning, and ſome of the Protectors friends ſaid, that the Duke was the firſt mover of the Protector to this matter, ſending a privie meſſenger unto him ſtreight after King Edwards death. But others againe, which knew better the ſubtill wit of the Protector, deny that he ever opened his enterpriſe to the Duke, untill he had brought to paſſe the things before rehearſed. But when hee had impriſoned the Queenes kindred, and gotten both her ſonnes into his owne hands; then he opened the reſt of his purpoſe with leſſe feare to them whom he thought meet for the matter, and eſpecially to the Duke, who being woone to his deſignes, he held his ſtrength more then halfe increaſed. The matter was broken unto the Duke by ſubtill perſons, and ſuch as were their crafts-maſters in the handling of ſuch wicked deviſes: who declared unto him that the young King was offended with him, for his kinſfolkes ſakes, and if hee were ever able he would revenge them; who would pricke him forward thereunto if they eſcaped (for they would remember their impriſonment) or elſe if they were put to death, without doubt the young King would be carefull for their deaths, whoſe impriſonments was grievous unto him. And that with repenting the Duke ſhould nothing avayle, for there was no way left to redeeme his offence by benefits, but he ſhould ſooner deſtroy himſelfe then ſave the King, who with his brother, and his kinſfolkes he ſaw in ſuch places impriſoned, as the Protector might with a becke deſtroy them all: and without all doubt would doe it indeed, if there were any new enterpriſe attempted. And that it was likely as the Protector had provided privie guard for himſelfe, ſo had he ſpials for the Duke, and traines to have caught him, if he ſhould be againſt him, & that peradventure from them vvhom he leaſt ſuſpected. For the ſtate of things, and the diſpoſitiõs of men then vvere ſuch, that a man could not vvell tell vvhom he might truſt, or vvhom he might feare. Theſe things, and ſuch like, being beaten into the Dukes minde, brought him to that point, that vvhere he had repented the vvay that he had entred, yet vvould he goe forvvard in the ſame, and ſince hee had once begun, hee vvould ſtoutly goe through. And therefore to this vvicked enterpriſe vvhich hee beleeved beleeved could not bee avoyed, hee bent himselfe, determining, sith the common mischiefe could not be amended, he would turne it as much as hee might to his owne commodity.

(40) Then was it agreed, that the Protector shovld have the Dukes ayde to make him King, and that the Protectors only lawfull sonne should marry the Dukes daughter; and that the Protector should grant him the quiet possession of the Earledome of Hertford, which he claimed as his inheritance, and could never attaine it in King Edwards time. Besides these requests of the Duke, the Protector of his owne accord, promised him a great quantity of the Kings Treasurie, and of his houshold stuffe. And when they were thus at a point betwixt themselves, they went about to prepare for the Coronation of the yong King as they would have it seeme. And that they might turne both the eyes and mindes of men from perceiving of their drifts otherwhere, the Lords were sent for from all parts of the Realme, and came flocking unto the solemnity. But the Protector and Duke after they had sent the Lord Cardinall Archbishop of Yorke, then L. Chancellour, the Bishop of Ely, the Lords Stanley, and Hastings, then Lord Chamberlaine, with many other Noblemen, to conferre and devise about the Coronation in one place, as fast they were in another place contriving the contrary, to make the Protector King: to which counsell, albeit there were adhibited very few, and they very secret; yet began here and there, some muttering among the people, as though all should not long be well, though they neither knew what they feared, nor wherefore: were it that before such great things, mens hearts of a secret instinct of nature mis-give them, as the Sea without winde swelleth of himselfe sometime before a tempest; or were it that some one man happily somewhat perceiving, filled many men with suspition, though hee shewed few men what hee knew. Howbeit somewhat the dealing it selfe made men to muse on the matter, though the counsell were close: For by little and little, all men with-drew from the Tower, and repaired to Crosbies in Bishopsgate street, where the Protector kept his house in great state. So that the Protector had the resort, and the King left in a manner desolate. And whilest some for their businesse made suite to such as were in office for the King, some were secretely by their friends warned, that it might happily doe them no good, to be too much attendant about the king without the Protectors appointment, who then began to remove many of the Princes old servants, and in their stead to place about him new.

(41) Thus many things meeting together, partly by purpose, and partly by chance, caused at length not onely the common people, that move with the winde, but wisemen also, and some Lords likewise to marke and muse at the matter; insomuch, that the Lord Stanley, who was after Earle of Darby, said to the Lord Hastings, that he much misliked these two severall counsels. For while we (quoth he) talke of one matter in the one place, little wot wee, whereof they talke in the other place. My Lord (quoth the Lord Hastings) of my life never doubt you: for while* one man is there, which is never thence, never can things be mooved that should sound amisse against me, but it shall be in mine eares ere it be well out of their mouthes: this meant he by Catesby, which was of his neere counsell, and whom he very familiarly used, and in his most weighty matters put no man in so speciall trust, nor no man so much beholden unto him as Catesby was. A man indeed well learned in the Lawes of this Land, and by speciall favour of the Lord Chamberlaine, in good authority, and bare much rule in Leicestershire, where the Lord Hastings power chiefly lay. But surely great pitty it was, that he had not had either more truth, or lesse wit. For his dissimulation onely kept all that mischiefe up: in whom, if the Lord Hastings had not put so speciall trust, the Lord Stanley and hee had departed, with divers other Lords, and had broken all the dance, for may ill signes that he saw, which he now construes all to the best: So surely thought he that there could be no harme towards him intended, in that counsell where Catesby was. And of truth, the Protector and Duke of Buckingham, made very good semblance unto the Lord Hastings, whom undoubtedly the Protector loved well, and loath was to have lost him, but for feare least his life should have qualeid their purpose; for which cause hee moved Catesby to prove with some words, cast out a farre off, whether he could thinke it possible to win the Lord Chamberlaine to their part. But Catesby whether he assayed him, or assayed him not, reported unto them, as hee found him so fast, and heard him speake so terrible words, that hee durst no further breake. True it is, that the Lord Chamberlaine, of very trust shewed unto Catesby, the distrust that others began to have in the matter: and therefore Catesby fearing, as he affirmed, least their motion might with the Lord Hastings diminish his credence, whereunto onely all the matter leaned; hee counselled and procured the Protector hastily to rid him. And much the rather, for that he trusted by his death, to obtaine much of the rule that the Lord Hastings bare in his Country: the onely desire whereof, was the allective that induced him to be partner, and one speciall contriver of all this horrible Treason.

(42) Soone after this, upon Friday the thirteenth day of Iune, many Lords assembled in the Tower, and there sate in counsell, devising the honourable solemnity of the Kings Coronation; of the which the time appointed was so neere, that the Pageants and fubtilties were in making day and night at Westminster, and much victuall killed, that afterward was cast away. These Lords sitting together communing of this matter, the Protector came in amongst them about nine of the clocke, saluting them courteously, and excusing himselfe, that hee had beene from them so long, saying merrily, I have beene a sleeper this day. and after a little talke with them, he said to the Bishop of Ely; My Lord, you have very good Strawburies at your Garden in Holborne: I pray you let us have a messe of them. Gladly my Lord, said the Bishop, would God I had some better thing as ready to pleasure you as that: and therewith in all haste hee sent his servant for a messe of Strawberries. Whereupon the Protector setting the Lords fast in conference, prayed them to spare him for a little while, and departed thence. But soone after, betwixt tenne and eleven, he returned into the Counsell Chamber amongst them, with a wonderfull sowre and angry countenance, knitting the browes, frowning and fretting, and gnawing on his lippes, sate him downe in his place, all the Lords much dismayed, sore marvelling of this his sodaine change, and what thing should him ayle: Hee sitting thus a while, beganne thus to speake: What are they worthy to have, that compasse and imagine the destruction of mee, being so neere of bloud unto the King, and Protector of his Royall person and his Realme? At which question, all the Lords sate sore astonied, musing much by whom this question should bee meant, of which every man knew himselfe cleare.

The Protector now another man.

(43) Then the Lord Chamberlaine, as he that for the love betwixt them, thought he might be boldest with him, answered and said, That they were worthy to be punished as hainous Traitors whatsoever they were: and the same all the other Lords affirmed. That is (quoth the Protector) yonder Sorceresse my brothers wife, meaning the Queene, and others with her: at these words many of the Lords that favoured her, were greatly abashed: but the L. Hastings was in his minde better content, that it was moved by her, then by any other whom hee loved better: howbeit, his heart somewhat grudged, that he was not afore made of counsell in this matter, as hee he was of the taking of her kindred, and of their putting to death, which were by his assent before devised to be beheaded at Pomfret the selfe same day, in which he was not aware, how it was by other devised, that himselfe should be beheaded the same day at London. Then said the Protector, yee shall all see in what wise that Sorceresse, and that other Witch of her councell, Shores wife, with their affinity, have by their sorcery and witchcraft wasted my body. And therewith hee plucked up his doublet sleeve to the elbow upon his left arme, where he shewed a wearish withered arme, and small, as it was never other.

(44) And thereupon every mans minde sore misgave them, well perceiving that this matter was but a quarrell: For they well knew, that the Queene was too wise to go about any such folly; and if she would, yet would she of all others, not make Shores Wife, of counsell, whom of all Women shee most hated, as that Concubine whom the King her Husband had most loved. And also no man there present, but knew well enough, that his arme was ever such since his birth. Nevertheless the Lord Chamberlaine, (which from the death of King Edward kept Shores Wife, on whom hee somewhat doated in the Kings life, saving as it is said, that he forbare her for reverence towards the King, or else of a certaine kinde of fidelity to his friend) answered and said: Certainely my Lord, if they have so heinously done, they bee worthy of haynous punishment. What (quoth the Protector) thou serveſt mee I weene with ifs and with ands, I tell thee they have so done, and that I will make good on thy body Traytor. And therewith as in a great anger, hee clapped his fist upon the board a great rap: at which token given, one without the Chamber cryed, treason, wherewith a doore clapped, and in came rushing men in harnesse, as many as the Chamber might hold, and anone the Protector said to the Lord Hastings, I arrest thee Traytor: What me my Lord, quoth hee? yea thee Traytor, quoth the Protector; and another let flye at the Lord Stanley, who shrunke at the stroke under the Table, or else his head had been cleft to the teeth: for as swiftly as hee shrunke, yet came the bloud about his eares. Then were they all quickly bestowed in divers Chambers, excepting onely the Lord Chamberlaine, whom the Protector bad speed and shrive him apace, for by Saint Paul said he, I will not to dinner till I see thy head off. It booted him not to aske why, but heavily tooke a Priest at adventurne, and made a short shrift, for a longer would not be suffered; the Protector made so much haste to dinner, which he might not goe to, till this was done, for saving of his oath. So was he brought forth unto the greene, before the Chappell within the Tower, and his head laid downe upon a long logge of timber, and there strucke off, and afterward his body, with the head, was enterred at Windsor, beside the body of King Edward.

(45) A marvailous case it is to heare, either of the warnings that he should have voyded, or the tokens of that he could not avoyde: for the selfe-night before his death, the Lord Stanley sent a trusty secret Messenger unto him at Mid-night in all the haste, requiring him to rise, and ride away with him, for hee was utterly disposed no longer to abide, hee had so fearefull a dreame: in which he thought, that a Bore with his tuskes, so razed them both by the heads, that the bloud ranne about both their shoulders. And forasmuch as the Protector gave the Bore for his cognizance, this dreame made so fearefull an impression in his heart, that he was throughly determined no longer to tarry, but had his Horse ready, if the Lord Hastings would goe with him, to ride yet so farre the same night, that they would bee out of danger before it was day. Ah good Lord (quoth the Lord Hastings to the Messenger) leaneth my Lord thy Master so much to such trifles, and hath faith in dreames, which either his owne feare fantasieth, or doe rise in the nights rest, by reason of the dayes thoughts? Tell him it is plaine Witchcraft, to beleeve in such dreames, which if they were tokens of things to come, why thinketh he not, that we might be as likely to make them true by our going, if we were caught and brought backe (as friends faile flyers) for then had the Bore a cause likely to rase us with his tuskes, as men that fled for some falshood: wherefore, either there is no perill, nor none there is indeed, or if any be, it is rather in going then abiding: And if we must needs fall in peril, one way or other, yet had I rather, that men should see, it were by other mens fallhood, then thinke it our fault or faint heart. And therefore go to thy Master man, and commend me to him, and pray him to be merry, and have no feare; for I assure him, I am as sure of the man that hee wotteth of, as I am of mine owne hand. God send Grace Sir, (said the Messenger) and went his way.

(46) Certaine it is also, that in riding towards the Tower the same morning in which hee was beheaded, his Horse twice or thrice stumbled with him, almost to the falling; which thing, albeit each man knoweth daily hapneth, to them to whom no such mischance is toward, yet hath it beene of an old rite and custome observed, as a token oftentimes, notably foregoing some great mis-fortune: Now this that followeth was no warning, but an envious scorne. The same morning before hee was up, came a Knight unto him, as it were of curtesie, to accompany him to the Councell; but of truth sent by the Protector, to haste him thithirwards, with whom he was of secret confederacy in that purpose, a meane man at that time, but now of great authority. This Knight, when it happened the Lord Chamberlain by the way to stay his horse, and commune a while with a Priest whom hee met in Tower-street, brake his tale, and said merrily to him; what my Lord, I pray you come on, whereto talke you so long with a Priest? you have no need of a Priest yet, and therewith laughed upon him, as though hee would say, yee shall have soone. But so little wist the other what hee meant, and so little mistrusted his present perill, as hee never was merrier, nor never so full of good hope in his life, which selfe thing is often seene a signe of change, but I shall rather let any thing passe mee, then the vaine furetie of mans minde so neere his death. Vpon the very Tower-wharfe, so neere the place where his head was strooke off soone after, there met he with one Hastings, a Pursevant of his owne name: And of their meeting in that place, hee was put in remembrance of another time, in which it had happened them before, to meet in the like manner together in the same place. At which other time the Lord Chamberlaine had beene accused unto King Edward by the Lord Rivers the Queenes Brother, in such wise as hee was for the while, (but it lasted not long) farre fallen into the Kings indignation, and stood in great feare of himselfe. And forasmuch as hee now met this Pursevant in the same place, that jeopardie so well passed, it gave him great pleasure to talke with him thereof; with whom he had before talked thereof in the same place, while he was therein. And therefore he said, ah Hastings, art thou remembred that I met thee once here with a heavie heart? yea my Lord (quoth he) that remember I well, and thanked be God, they got no good, nor you no great harme. Thou wouldest say so (quoth he) if thou knew so much as I know, which few know elses as yet, and more shall shortly. That meant hee by the Lords of the Queenes kindred, which were taken before, and should that same day bee beheaded at Pomfret: which hee well wist, but was nothing aware, that the axe hung over his owne head. In faith man (quoth he) I was never so sorry, nor never stood in so great dread of my life, as I did when thou and I met here; And loe, how the world is changed, now stand my enemies in the danger (as thou maist hap to heare more hereafter) and I never in my life so merry, nor never in so great surety. Oh good God, the blindnesse of our mortall nature! when he most feared, he was in good suretie, when he reckoned himselfe surest, he lost his life, and that within two houres after. Thus ended this honourable man, a good Knight and a gentle, of great authority with his Prince, of living somewhat dissolute, plaine and open to his enemies, and secret to his friends, easie to be beguiled, as he that of good heart and courage fore-studied no perils; a loving man, a passing well-beloved: very faithfull, and trusty enough, trusting indeed too much. Now slew the fame of this Lords death swiftly through the Citie, and from thence further, like a winde, in every mans eare.

Citizens ſent for into the Tower to the Protector.

(47) But the Protector immediately after dinner, intending to set some colour upon the matter, sent in all hast for many substantiall men, out of the Citie into the Tower, at whose comming thither, himselfe with the Duke of Buckingham, stood harnessed in old rusty briganders, such as no more, man should weene, that they would vouchsafe to have put on their backes, except that some sudden necessitie had constrained them thereto. And then the Protector shewed them, that the Lord Chamberlaine, and others of his conspiracy, had contrived to have suddenly destroyed him and the Duke there the same day in Counsell. And what they intended further, was not yet well knowne. Of which their treason he never had knowledge, before ten of the clocke, the same fore-noone, which sudden feare drove them to put on for their defence, such harnesse as came next to hand: and so had God holpen them, that the mischiefe returned upon them that would have done it: and this hee required them to report.

The fained feare of the Lord Protector.

(48) Every man answered him faire, as though no man mistrusted the matter, which of truth no man beleeved; yet for the further appeasing of the peoples minde, he sent immediately after dinner, in all haste, an Herald of Armes, with a Proclamation to be made through the Citie, in the Kings name, containing that the Lord Haſtings, with divers others of his traiterous purpose, had before conspired the same day, to have slaine the Lord Protector, and Duke of Buckingham, sitting in the Councell, and after to have taken upon them, to rule the King and the Realme, at their owne pleasures; thereby to pill and spoyle whom they listed, uncontrolled. And much matter there was in that Proclamation, devised to the slander of the Lord Chamberlaine, as that he was an evill Counseller to the Kings father, entising him to many things, highly redounding to his great dishonour, and to the universall hurt of his Realme, by his evill company, sinister procuring, and ungracious example, aswell in many other things, as in the vicious living, and inordinate abusion of his body, both with many others, and especially with Shores Wife, who was one also of his most secret Counsell, in this hainous treason, with whom he lay nightly, and namely, the night last past before his death, so that it was the lesse marvell, if ungracious living brought him to an unhappy ending, which he was now put unto, by the most dread commandement of the Kings Highnesse, and of his honourable and faithfull Counsell, both for his demerits, being so openly taken in his falsely conceived treason, as also least the delaying of his execution, might have encouraged other mischievous persons, partners of his conspiracy, to gather and assemble themselves together in making some great commotion for his deliverance, whose hope being now by his well-deserved death politickly represſed, all the Realme should by Gods grace, rest in good quiet and peace.

A Proclamation made to publiſh the Lord Haſtings treaſons.

(49) Now was this Proclamation made within two houres, after that he was beheaded, and was so curiously indited, and so faire written in Parchment, in so well a set hand, and therewith of it selfe so long a processe, as every child might perceive, that it was prepared before. For all the time between his death, and the proclaiming, could scant have sufficed unto the bare writing alone; had it beene but in paper, and scribled forth in hast at adventure. So that upon the proclaiming thereof, one that was Schoole-master of Paules, of chance standing by, and comparing the shortnesse of the time, with the length of the matter, said unto them that stood about him; Here is a gay goodly cast, foule cast away for hast: and a Merchant answered him, that it was written by Prophesie. Now then by and by, as it were for anger, nor for covetousnesse, the Protector sent the Sheriffes of London, into the house of Shores Wife (for her Husband dwelled not with her) and spoyled her of all that shee had, above the value of three thousand markes, carrying her through London unto the Tower, and there left her Prisoner, where (for fashion fake) he laid to her charge, that shee went about to bewitch him, and that shee was of Counsell with the Lord Chamberlaine to destroy him: In conclusion, when no colour could fasten upon these matters, then laid hee hainously unto her charge, the thing that her selfe could not deny, that all the World wist was true, and that neithlesse every man laughed at, to heare it then so suddenly, so highly taken, that shee was nought of her body. And for that cause (as a good continent Prince, cleare and faultlesse himselfe, sent out of Heaven into this vitious World for the amendment of mens manners) after she had laine prisoner in Ludgate, he caused the Bishop of London to put her to open penance, going before the Crosse in procession upon a Sunday, with a Taper in her hand. In which shee went in countenance and pace demure, so womanly, and albeit shee were out of all array save her Kirtle onely, yet went she so faire and lovely, namely while the wondering of the people cast a comely rud in her cheeks (of which before she had most mist) that her great shame wan her much praise, among those that were more amorous of her body, then curious of her soule. And many good folke also of that hated her living, and glad to see sinne so corrected, yet pitied the more her penance, then rejoyced therein, when they considered that the Protector procured it more of a corrupt intent, then any vertuous affection.

The Subje& is not unworthy to be written on.

(50) This Woman was borne in London, worshipfully friended, honestly brought up, and very well married, saving somewhat too soone; her Husband an honest Citizen, young, and goodly, and of good substance. But for as much as they were coupled ere shee were well ripe, shee not very fervently loved, for whom she never longed; which was haply the thing that the more made her incline unto the Kings appetite, when he required her. Howbeit the respect of his royaltie, the hope of gay apparell, ease, pleasure, and other wanton wealth, was able soone to pierce a soft tender heart. But when the King had abused her, anon her Husband (as he was an honest man, and one that could his good, not presuming to touch a Kings Concubine) left her up to him altogether. When the King dyed, the Lord Chamberlaine tooke her, which in the Kings daies, albeit he was sore enamoured upon her, yet hee forbare her, either for reverence, or for a certaine friendly faithfulnesse: proper she was, and faire; nothing in her body that you could have changed, unlesse you would have wished her somewhat higher. Thus they say that knew her in her youth. Albeit some that now see her (for as yet shee liveth) deeme her never to have beene well visaged, whose judgement seemeth to mee somewhat like, as though we could guesse the beautie of one long before departed, by her scalpe taken out of the Charnell-house: for now shee is old, leane, withered, and dried up, nothing left but riveled skinne, and hard bone; and yet being even such, who so well advise her visage, might guesse and devise, which parts how filled, would make it a faire face, face. Yet delighted not men, so much in her beauty, as in her pleasant behaviour, for a proper wit she had, and could both reade well and write, merry in company, ready and quicke of answer, neither mute nor full of babble, sometime taunting without displeasure, and not without disport: in whom King Edward tooke speciall pleasure, whose favour to say the truth (for sinne it were to belye the Divell) she never abused to any mans hurt, but to many a mans comfort and relicfe; when the King tooke displeasure, she would mitigate and appease his minde; where men were out of favour, shee would bring them in his grace, for many that highly offended she obtained pardon. Of great forfeitures shee gat them remission. And finally, in many weighty suites shee stood many men in great stead, either for none, or very small rewards, and those rather gay then rich, either for that shee was content with the deed it selfe well done, or for that she delighted to be sued unto, and to shew what she was able to doe with the King, or for that wanton women and wealthy, bee not always covetous. I doubt not some shall thinke this Woman too slight a thing to bee written of, and set among the remembrances of great matters: which they shall specially thinke, that happily shall esteeme her onely by that they now see her. But to my seeming, the chance is so much the more worthy to be remembred, in how much shee is now in the more beggerly condition, unfriended, and worne out of of acquaintance, after good substance, after so great favour with a Prince, after so great suit and seeking to, of all those, that in those dayes had businesse to speede, as many other men were in their times, which be now famous onely by the infamy of their ill deedes: her doings were not much lesse, albeit they be much lesse remembred, because they were not so evill: for men use, if they receive an evill turne, to write it in Marble: and who so doth us a good turne, wee write it in the dust; which is not worst proved by her: for at this day she beggeth of many, at this day living, that at this day had begged if she had not beene.

The plot and order how to proceede to the Protector to the Crowne.

(51) Now it was so devised by the Protector and his Councell, that the selfe-same day in which the L. Chamberlaine was beheaded in the Tower of London, and about the selfe-same houre was then (not without his assent) beheaded at Pomfret, the forerremembred Lords and Knights, that were taken from the King at Northampton, and Stony-Stratford; which thing was done in the presence, and by the order of Sir Richard Ratcliffe Knight, whose service the Protector specially used in that counsell, and in the execution of such lawlesse enterprises, as a man that had beene long secret with him, having experience of the World, and a shrewd wit, short and rude in speech, rough and boisterous of behaviour, bold in mischiefe, as farre from pitty, as from all feare of God. This Knight bringing them out of prison to the Scaffold, and shewing to the people present, that they were Traitors, not suffering them to speake, or declare their innocency, lest their words might have inclined men to pitty them, and to hate the Protector and his part; caused them hastily without Iudgement, processe, or manner of order to bee beheaded, and without all guilt, but onely that they were good men, too true to the King, and too nigh to the Queene.

The Sonne maketh the Mother an adulteresse.

(52) Now when the Lord Chamberlaine, and those other Lords and Knights were thus beheaded and ridde out of the way: then thought the Protector, that while men mused what the matter meant, while the Lords of the Realme were about him out of their owne strengths, while no man wist what to thinke, nor whom to trust, before they should have space to dispute, and digest the matter, and make parties, it were best hastily to pursue his purpose, and put himselfe in possession of the Crowne, ere men could have time to devise how to resist. But now was all the study, by what meanes the matter being of it selfe so haynous, might be first broken to the people in such wise as it might bee well taken. To this counsell they tooke divers, such as they thought meete to bee trusted, likely to be induced to that part, and able to stand them in stead, either by power or policy: Among whom they made of counsell Edmund Shaw Knight, then Major of London, who upon trust of his owne advancement, whereof he was of a proud heart, highly desirous, should frame the City to their appetite. Of spirituall men they tooke such as had wit, and were in authority among the people, for opinion of their learning, and had no scrupulous conscience. Among these had they Iohn Shaw Clerke brother to the Major, and Fryer Pinker Provincial of the Auguſtine Fryers, both of them Doctors in Divinity, both great Preachers, both of more learning then vertue, and of more fame then learning: for they were before greatly esteemed of the common people; but after that never. Of these two, the one made a Sermon in praise of the Protector before the Coronation; the other after, both so full of teadious flattery, as no mans eare could abide them.

The Major of London made of the Protectors Counſell.

Edward Pinker two flattering Preachers.

(53) Pinker in his Sermon so lost his voyce, that he was forced to leave off, and came downe in the middest. Doctor Shaw by his Sermon lost his honesty, and soone after his life, for very shame of the world, into which he durst never after come abroad. But the Fryer forced for no shame, and so it harmed him the lesse. Howbeit some doubt, and many thinke, that Pinker was not of counsell in the matter before the Coronation, but after the common manner, fell to flattery after: namely, sith his Sermon was not incontinent upon it, but at Saint Maries Hospitall in the Easter Weeke following. But certaine it is, that Doctor Shaw was of counsell in the beginning, so farre forth as they determined that he should first breake the matter in a Sermon at Pauls-Crosse, in which he should by the authority of his preaching, incline the people to the Protectors ghostly purpose. But now was all the labour and study, in the devise of some convenient pretext; for which the people should bee content to depose the Prince, and accept the Protector for King. In which divers things they devised: but the chiefe thing and the weightiest of all, the invention reſted in this, that they should alledge bastardy, either in King Edward himselfe, or in his Children, or both. So that hee should seeme disabled to inherite the Crowne, by the Duke of Yorke, and the Prince by him. To lay bastardy in King Edward, founded openly to the rebuke of the Protectors owne Mother, who was Mother to them both: for in that point could be none other colour, but to pretend that his owne Mother was an adulteresse, which notwithstanding to further the purpose he letted not: but yet he would that point should be lesse, and more favourably handled, not fully plaine and directly, but that the matter should bee touched aslope, and craftily, as though men spared in that point to speake all the truth for feare of his displeasure. But the other point, concerning the bastardy that they devised to surmise in King Edwards Children, that would he should be openly declared, and enforced to the uttermost. The colour and pretext whereof, was a contract pretended to be made by King Edward unto the Lady Lucy, whereof we have spoken in the raigne of the said King: which invention how simple soever, yet it liked them, to whom it sufficed to have somewhat to say, while they were sure to bee compelled to no larger proofe then themselves list to make.

Pinker preached at Saint Maries Hospitall, and Doctor Shaw at Pauls-Crosse.

King Edwards and his children made bastards.

(54) Now then it was by the Protector and his Councell concluded, that Doctor Shaw should signifie in his Sermon aforesaid, that neither King Edward himselfe, nor the Duke of Clarence were lawfully begot, nor were the very Children of the Duke of Yorke, but begot unlawfully by other persons, by Adultery of the Dutches their Mother. And also that Dame Elizabeth Lucy was verily the Wife of King Edward, and so the Prince and all his other children, begot by the Queene, were all of them bastards. And according to this devise Doctor Shaw upon Sunday the nineteenth of June, at Pauls-Crosse, in a frequent assembly, tooke for the theame of his Sermon this saying, Spuria vitulamina non agent radices altas: Bastard slips shall never take deepe roote. Whereupon, when he had shewed the great grace that God giveth, and secretely infunded in right generation after the lawes of Matrimony, then declared he, that commonly those children lacked that grace, and for the punishment of their parents, were for the more part unhappy, which were begot in base, but specially in adultery. Of which though some by the ignorance of the world, and the truth hid from knowledge inherite for the time other mens lands, yet God alwaies so provideth, that it continueth not in their blound long, but the truth comming to light, the rightfull inheritors be restored, and the bastards slip pulled up ere it can take any deepe root. And when he had laid for the proofe and confirmation of this sentence certaine examples taken out of the old Testament, and other ancient Histories, then he began to descend into the praise of the Lord Richard, late Duke of Yorke, calling him the father to the Lord Protector, and declared the title of his heires unto the Crowne, to whom it was after the death of King Henry the sixt, entayled by authoritie of Parliament. Then shewed he, that the very right heire of his body lawfully begotten, was onely the Lord Protector. For he declared then that King Edward was never lawfully married unto the Queene, but was before God, Husband unto Dame Elizabeth Lucy, and so his Children bastards. And besides that, neither King Edward himselfe, nor the Duke of Clarence, among those that were secret in the Houshold, were reckoned very certainly for the children of the noble Duke, as those that by their features resembled other knowne men more then him, from whose vertuous conditions, he said also, that King Edward was far off. But the Lord Protector, he said, the very Noble Prince, the speciall patterne of Knightly prowesse, as well in all Princely behaviour, as in the lineaments and favour of his Visage, representing the very face of the Noble Duke his father: This is (quoth he) the fathers owne figure, this is his owne countenance, the very print of his visage, the very undoubted Image and plaine expresse likenesse of that noble Duke.

(55) Now it was before devised, that in the speaking of these words, the Protector should have come in among the people to the Sermon-ward, to the end that those words meeting with his presence, might have beene taken among the hearers, as though the holy Ghost had put them in the Preachers mouth, and should have mooved the people even then to cry, King Richard, King Richard, that it might have been after said, that he was specially chosen by God, and in manner by miracle. But this devise quailed, either by the Protectors negligence, or by the Preachers over-much diligence; for while the Protector found by the way tarrying, lest he should prevent those words, and the Doctor fearing least hee should come ere his Sermon could come to these words, hasted his matter thereto, who was come to them and past them, and had entred into other matter ere the Protector came. Whom when he beheld comming, he suddenly left the matter with which he was in hand, and without any deduction thereunto, out of all order, and out of all frame, began to repeate those words againe: This is the very Noble Prince, the speciall paterne of Knightly prowesse, which as well in all Princely behaviour, as in the lineaments and favour of his visage, representeth the very face of the Noble Duke of Yorke his father: this is the Fathers owne figure, this is his owne countenance, the very print of his Visage, the sure undoubted Image, the plaine expresse likeneesse of the Noble Duke, whose remembrance can never die while hee liveth. While these words were in speaking, the Protector, accompanied with the Duke of Buckingham, went through the people, into the place where the Doctors commonly stand in an upper Storie, where he stood to heare the Sermon. But the people were so farre from crying King Richard, that they stood as if they had beene turned into stones, for wonder of this shamefull Sermon. After which once ended, the Preacher got him home, and never after durst looke out for shame, but kept himselfe out of sight like an Owle. And when he once asked one, that had beene his old friend, what the people talked of him, albeit that his owne conscience well shewed him that they talked no good, yet when the other answered him, that there was in every mans mouth spoken of him much shame, it so strucke him to the heart, that within few daies after, he withered and consumed away.

(56) On the Tuesday following this Sermon, there came into the Guild-Hall in London the Duke of Buckingham, accompanied with divers Lords and Knights, more perchance then knew the message which they brought. And there in the East end of the Hall, where the Major keepeth the huftings, the Major, and Aldermen being assembled about him, and all the Commons of the Citie gathered before him after silence commanded in the Protectors name upon great paine, the Duke stood up, and (as he was neither unlearned, and of nature marvellously well spoken) he said unto the people with a cleare and loud voyce in this manner: Friends, for the zeale and hearty favour that we beare you, we be come to breake unto you, a matter of great weight, and no lesse weightie, then pleasing to God, and profitable to all the Realme: nor to no part of the Realme more profitable then to you the Citizens of this noble Citie. For why, the thing that we wot well you have long time lacked, and so longed for, that you would have given great good for, that you would have gone farre to fetch, that thing we be come hither to bring you, without your labour, paine, cost, adventure, or jeopardie. What thing is that? Certes, the suretie of your owne bodies, the quiet of your wives, and your daughters, the safeguard of your goods: of all which things in times past you stood evermore in doubt. For who was there of you all, that could account himselfe Lord of his owne goods, among so many snares and traps as were set therefore, among so much pilling and polling, among so many taxes and tallages, of which there was never end, and often times no need: or if any were, it rather grew of riot, and unreasonable waste, then any necessary or honorable charge: So that there was daily pilling from good men and honest, great substance of goods, to be lashed out among unthrifts, so farre forth that fifteenes sufficed not, nor any usuall manner of knowne taxes: but under an easie name of benevolence and good will, the Commissioners so much of every man tooke, as no man could with his good will have given. As though that name of benevolence, had signified that every man should pay not what himselfe of his owne good will list to grant, but what the King of his good will list to take. Who never asked little, but every thing was haunsed above the measure, amercements turned into fines, fines into ransomes; small trespasses into misprision; misprision into treason. Whereof I thinke no man looketh that wee should remember you of examples by name, as though Burdet were forgotten, who was for a word in haste spoken, cruelly beheaded, by the misconstruing of the Lawes of this Realme for the Princes pleasure: with no lesse honour to Markham then chiefe Iustice, that left his office rather then hee would assent to that judgement, then to the dishonestly assent of those, that either for feare or flattery gave that judgement. What Cooke your owne worshipfull neighbour, Alderman and Major of this noble

What speake we of losse? "His utter spoile and undeserved destruction, onely "for that it happened those to favour him whom "the Prince favoured not. Wee need not (I sup"pose) to rehearse of these any moe by name, sith "there be (I doubt not) many heere present, that ei"ther in themselves, or in their nigh friends, have "knowne as well their goods, as their persons greatly "indangered, either by fained quarrels, or small mat"ters agrieved with heinous names. And also there "was no crime so great, of which there could lacke "a pretext. For sith the King preventing the time "of his inheritance, attained the Crowne by battell; "it sufficed in a rich man for a pretext of treason, to "have beene of kindred or aliance, neere familiaritie, "or longer acquaintance, with any of those that "were at any time the Kings enemies, which was at "one time or other more then halfe the Realme. "Thus were your goods never in suretie, and yet "they brought your bodies in jeopardie, beside the "common adventure of open warre, which albeit, "that it is ever the will and occasion of much mis"chiefe, yet it is never so mischievous, as where any "people fall at distance among themselves, nor in no "earthly Nation so deadly and so pestilent, as when "it happeneth among us: and among us never so "long continued dissention, nor so many battels in "that season, nor so cruell and so deadly fought as "was in that Kings dayes that dead is, God forgive "it his soule. In whose time, and by whose occasion, "what about the getting of the Garland, keeping it, "loosing it, and winning it againe, it hath cost more "English bloud, then hath twice the winning of "France: In which inward warre among our selves, "hath beene so great effusion of the ancient noble "bloud of this Realme, that scarcely the halfe re"maineth, to the great infeebling of this noble "Land, beside many a good Towne ransacked, and "spoyled by them that have beene going to the "field, or comming from thence. And peace long "after not much surer then warre. So that no time "there was, in which rich men for their money, and "great men for their Lands, or some or other for "some feare or some displeasure, were not out of pe"rill; for whom trusted he, that mistrusted his owne "brother? whom spared he, that killed his owne "brother? or who could perfectly love him, if his "owne brother could not? what manner of folke he "most favoured, we shall for his honour spare to "speake of; howbeit, this wot you well all, that who "so was best, bare alway least rule; and more suite "was in those dayes unto Shores Wife, a vile and "abhominable strumpet, then to all the Lords in "England; except unto those that made her their "Protector: which simple woman was well named, "and honest, till the KING for his wanton lust, "and sinfull affection, bereft her from her Hus"band, a right honest substantiall young man among "you. And in that point, which in good faith I am "sorry to speake of, saving that it is in vaine to keepe "in counsell that thing which every man knoweth; "the Kings greedy appetite was insatiable, and eve"ry where over all the Realme intollerable, for no "woman there was any where, young or old, rich or "poore, whom he set his eye upon, in whom he li"ked any thing, either person, or favour, speech, "pace, or countenance; but without all feare of God, "or any respect of his owne honour, murmure, or "grudge of the world, he would importunately pur"sue his appetite, and have her, to the great destru"ction of many a good woman, and great dolour to "their Husbands and other their friends, which be"ing honest people of themselves, so much regard "the cleanneese of their house, the chastitie of their "Wives, and their Daughters, that they had rather "lose all they had besides, then to have such a vil"lany done against them. And albeit, that with this "and his other importable dealings, the Realme "was in every part annoyed: yet specially, you here "the Citizens of this noble Citie, aswell for that a"mongst you is most pleatie of all such things, as "minister matters to such injuries, as for that you "were neereft at hand, seeing that neere hereabout "was commonly his most abiding. And yet you "be the people whom hee had a singular cause well "and kindly to entreat, as any part of the Realme, "not onely for that the Prince by this noble Citie, "as his speciall Chamber, and the speciall well"renowned Citie of his Realme, much honourable "fame receiveth amongst all other Nations: but also "for that yee, not without your great cost, and sun"dry perils and jeopardies in all his warres, bare e"ven your speciall favour to his part; which your "kind minds borne unto the house of Yorke, sith he "hath nothing-worthily acquitted, there is one of "that house, that now by Gods grace, better shall: "which thing to shew you is the whole summe and "effect of this our present errand. It shall not, I "wot well, need that I rehearse you againe, that ye "have already heard of him that can better tell it, "and of whom I am sure you will better beleeve it, "and reason is it so to be. I am not so proud to "looke therefore, that you should reckon my words "of as great authority, as the Preachers of the Word "of God; namely, a man so learned and so wise, "that no man better wotteth what he should say, and "therero so good and vertuous, as he would not say "the thing which he wist he should not say in the "Pulpit; namely, into the which no honest man "commeth to lye: which honourable Preacher, you "well remember, substantially declared at Paule "Crosse, on Sunday last past, the right and title that "the most excellent Prince, Richard Duke of Glouce"ster, now Protector of this Realme, hath unto the "Crowne and Kingdome of the same. For as the "Worshipfull Doctor substantially made knowne "unto you, the Children of King Edward the fourth "were never lawfully begotten, forasmuch as the "King (leaving his very wife Dame Elizabeth Lucy) "was never lawfully married unto the Queene their "Mother, whose bloud, saving that he set his volup"tuous pleasure before his honour, was full unmeet "to be matched with his; and the mingling of those "blouds together hath beene the effusion of great "part of the noble bloud of this Realme. Whereby "it may well seeme, the marriage was not well made, "of which there is so much mischiefe growne. For "lack of which lawfull coupling, as also other things, "which the said worshipfull Doctor rather signified, "then fully explained, and which things shall not be "spoken for mee, as the thing wherein every man "forbeareth to say what he knoweth, in avoiding "displeasure of my noble Lord Protector; bearing, "as nature requireth, a filiall reverence to the Dut"chesse his Mother: For these causes I say, before "remembred, that is, for lacke of other Issue law"fully comming of that late noble Prince Richard "Duke of Yorke, to whose royall bloud the Crowne "of England and France, is by the high authoritie of "Parliament entailed; the right and title of the same, "is by the just course of inheritance, according to "the common law of this Land, devolved and come "unto the most excellent Prince the Lord Prote"ctor, as to the very lawfully begotten sonne, of the "fore-remembred noble Duke of Yorke. Which "thing well considered, and the great knightly "prowesse pondered, with manifold vertues which "in his noble person singularly abound, the No"bles and Commons also of this Realme, and spe"cially of the North part, not willing any bastard"bloud to have the rule of the Land, nor the abu"sions before the same used, any longer to continue, "have condiscended, and fully determined, to make "humble petition to the most puissant Prince the "Lord Protector, that it may like his Grace at our

The Dukes pithy perſwaſions unto the Citizens.

(57) When the Duke had ſaid, and looked that the people whom hee hoped the Major had framed before, ſhould after this propoſition made, have cryed, King Richard, King Richard; all was huſht and mute, and not a word anſwered thereunto: wherewith the Duke was marveiloſly abaſhed, and taking the Major neerer to him, with other that were about him privie to that matter, ſaid unto him ſoftly; What meaneth this, that the people be ſo ſilent? Sir (quoth the Major) perchance they perceive you not well, that ſhall we mend (quoth he) if that will helpe. And by and by ſomewhat lowder, he rehearſed them the ſame matter againe, in other order, and other words, ſo well and ornately, ſo evidently and plaine, with voyce, geſture, and countenance ſo comely, that every man much marvailed that heard him, and thought they never had in their hearing, ſo evill a tale ſo well told. But were it for wonder or feare, or that each man look that other ſpeake firſt; not a word was there anſwered of all the people that ſtood before but was as ſtill as midnight, not ſo much as rowning among themſelves, by which they might ſeeme to commune what was beſt to doe. When the Lord Major ſaw this, he, with the other partners of that counſell drew about the Duke, and ſaid, That the people had not beene accuſtomed there to bee ſpoken unto, but by the Recorder; who is the mouth of the Citie, and happily to him they will anſwere. With that the Recorder called Fitz-William, a ſad man and an honeſt, who was ſo newly come into that office, that hee never had ſpoken to the people before, and loth was with that matter to begin; notwithſtanding, thereunto commanded by the Major, he made rehearſall to the Commons, of that the Duke had twice rehearſed to them himſelfe. But the Recorder ſo rempered his tale, that he ſhewed every thing as the Dukes words, and no part of his owne. But all this noting, no change made in the people, which ſtood gazing at the Bench as men altogether amazed. Whereupon the Duke rowned unto the Major, and ſaid, This is marvailous obſtinate ſilence, and therewith he turned unto the people againe with theſe words: Deare friends, we come to move you to that thing which peradventure wee not ſo greatly needed, but that the Lords of this Realme, and the Commons of other parts might have ſufficed, ſaving that we beare you ſuch love, and ſo much fet by your friendſhip, that we would not willingly doe without you the thing which is for our honour and your wealth, which as it ſeemeth, either you ſee not, or weigh not; wherefore we require you, give us anſwer, whether ye be minded as all the Nobles of the Realme be, to have this noble Prince now Protector, to be your King or not.

(58) At which words the people began to whiſper among themſelves ſecretly, that the voyce was neither loud nor diſtinct, but as it were the ſound of a ſwarme of Bees, till at the laſt, in the nether end of the Hall, a buſhment of the Dukes ſervants, and Naſh-fields, and of others belonging to the Protector, with ſome Prentiſes and laddes that thruſt into the Hall among the preſſe, began ſodainly at mens backes to cry out as loud as their throats would geve, King Richard, King Richard, and threw up their caps in token of joy. But they that ſtood before, caſt backe their heads, marvelling thereat, yet nothing they ſaid. And when the Duke and Major ſaw this manner, they wiſely turned it to their purpoſe, and ſaid it was a goodly cry, and a joyfull, to heare every man with one voyce, no man ſaying nay: wherefore friends (quoth the Duke) ſince that we well perceive that it is all your whole minds to have this Nobleman for your King, wherefore ſhall make to his Grace ſo effectuall report, that wee doubt not but it ſhall redound unto your great wealth, and commoditie: wee require that to morrow you goe with us, and wee with you unto his noble Grace, to make our humble requeſt unto him in manner before remembred. And therewith the Lords came downe, and the aſſembly diſſolved for the moſt part ſad, ſome with glad ſemblances, and yet not very merry, yea, and ſome that came with the Duke, not able to diſſemble their ſorrow, were faine at his backe to turne their face to the wall, while the dolour of their heart burſt out of their eyes.

(59) On the next morrow, the Major with all the Aldermen, and chiefe Commoners of the Citie in their beſt array, aſſembling themſelves together, reſorted unto Baynards Caſtle in Thames ſtreet, where the Protector lay. To which place repaired alſo according to their appointment, the Duke of Buckingham, with divers Noblemen with him, beſide many Knights and other Gentlemen. And thereupon the Duke ſent word unto the Lord Protector, of the being there of a great and honourable company, to move a great matter unto his Grace: whereupon the Protector made difficultie to come out unto them, but if he firſt knew ſome part of their errand, as though hee doubted, and partly diſtruſted the comming of ſuch a number unto him ſo ſodainly, without any warning, or knowledge whether they came for good or harme; then the Duke when he had ſhewed this unto the Maior and other, that they might thereby ſee, how little the Protector looked for this matter; they then ſent unto him by the Meſſenger ſuch loving meſſage againe, and therewith ſo humbly beſought him to vouchſafe, that they might reſort to his preſence, to propoſe their intent, which they would not impart to any other perſon; that at the laſt hee came out of his chamber, and yet not downe unto them, but ſtood above in a gallery over them, where they might ſee him and ſpeake to him, as though hee would not yet come too neare them, till he underſtood what they meant. And thereupon the Duke of Buckhingham firſt made humble petition unto him on the behalfe of them all, that his Grace would pardon them, and licenſe them to propoſe unto his Grace, the intent of their comming without his diſpleaſure, without which pardon obtained, they durſt not be ſo bold to move him in their ſuite. In which albeit they meant as much honour to his Grace, as wealth to all the Realme beſide, yet were they not ſure how his Grace would take it, whom they would in no wiſe offend. Then the Protector (as hee was very gently of himſelfe ſelfe and alſo longed ſore to know what they meant) gave him leave to propoſe what him liked, verily truſting for the good minde that he bare them all, none of them would intend any thing to him-ward, wherewith he ought to be grieved.

(60) When the Duke had this leave and pardon to ſpeake, then waxed he bold to ſhew him their entent and purpoſe, with all the cauſes moving them thereunto, as you have heard before: and finally, to beſeech his Grace, that it would like him of his accuſtomed goodneſſe and zeale unto the Realme, now with his eye of pitty, to behold the long-continued diſtreſſe, and decay of the ſame, and to ſet his gracious hands to redreſſe an amendment thereof, by taking upon him the Crowne and government of the land; according to his right and title lawfully deſcended unto him, & to the law of God, profit of the Realme, and unto his grace ſo much the more honour, and leſſe paine, in that, that never Prince raigned over any people that were ſo glad to live under his obeiſance, as the people of this land under his.

(61) When the Protector had heard the propoſition, he looked very ſtrange thereat, and anſwered: That albeit it were, hee partly knew the things by them alleadged to be true, yet ſuch intire love he bare unto King Edward and his children, that ſo much more he regarded his honor in other Realmes about, then the Crowne of any one, of which he was never deſirous, that he could not finde in his heart in this point to incline to their deſire. For in all other Nations where the truth was not well knowne, it would peradventure be thought, that it was his owne ambitious minde and deviſe to depoſe the Prince, and to take himſelfe the Crowne, with which infamie hee would not have his honour ſtained for any Crowne, in which he had ever perceived much more labour and paine, then pleaſure to him that would ſo uſe it, as he that would not, were not worthy to have it. Notwithſtanding hee not onely pardoned them the motion that they made him, but alſo thanked them for the love and hearty favour they bare him, praying them for his ſake to give and beare the ſame to the Prince, under whom he was, and would be content to live, and with his labour and counſell, as farre as ſhould like the King to uſe him, he would doe his uttermoſt endeavour to ſet the Realme in good ſtate, which was already in this little time of his Protectorſhip (the praiſe be given to God) well begun, in that the malice of ſuch as were before, occaſion of the contrary, and of new intended to be, were now partly by good pollicy, partly more by Gods ſpeciall providence, then mans proviſion, repreſſed.

(62) Vponthis anſwer given, the Duke by the Protectors licenſe, a little rowned, aſwell with other Noblemen about him, as with the Major and Recorder of London. And after that, upon like pardon deſired and obtained, hee ſhewed aloud unto the Protector for a finall concluſion, that the Realme was at a point, King Edwards line ſhould not any longer raigne over them, both for that they had ſo farre gone, as it was now no ſurety to retreat, as for that they thought it was for the weale univerſall to take that way, although they had not yet begun it. Wherefore, if it would like his Grace to take the Crowne upon him, they would humbly beſeech him thereunto; if he would give them a reſolute anſwer to the contrary, which they would be loath to heare, then muſt they needs ſeeke, and would not faile to finde ſome other Nobleman that would. Theſe words much mooved the Protector, which elſe as every man may know, would never of likelihood have inclined thereunto. But when he ſaw there was none other way, but that either he muſt take it, or elſe he, and his both goe from it, he ſaid unto the Lords and Commons.

The Protector favourably accepteth the Crowne.

(63) Sith we well perceive that all the Realme is ſo ſet, whereof we be very ſorry, that they will not ſuffer in any wiſe King Edwards line to governe them, whom no earthly man can governe againſt their wils, and well we alſo perceive, that no man there is to whom the Crowne can by juſt title appertaine, as to our ſelfe, as very right heire lawfully begotten of the body of our moſt deare Father Richard late Duke of Yorke, to which title is now joyned your election, the Nobles and Commons of this Realme, which we of all title poſſible take for the moſt effectuall: wee bee content, and agree favourably to incline to your petition and requeſt, and according to the ſame, we here take upon us the royall eſtate, preheminence, and kingdome of the two noble Realmes, England and France, the one from this day forward, by us and our heires, to rule, governe, and defend; the other by Gods grace, and your good helpe, to get againe, and ſubdue, and eſtabliſh for ever in due obedience unto this Realme of England, the advancement whereof we never aske of God longer to live, then we intend to procure. With this there was a great ſhout, crying King Richard, King Richard. And then the Lords went up to the King (for ſo was he from that time called) and the people departed, talking diverſly of the matter, every man as his fantaſie gave him.

Divers opinions of the people.

(64) Much was talked and marvelled at the manner of this dealing, that the matter was made ſo ſtrange unto both parties, as though they never had communed either with others before, when as themſelves wiſt there was no man ſo dull that heard them, but perceived well inough, that all the matter was ſo made betweene them. Howbeit, ſome excuſed that againe, and ſaid all muſt be done in good order: And men muſt ſometimes for manners ſake, not be acknowne what they know: for at the conſecration of a Biſhop, every man worteth well, by the paying for his Bulls, that he purpoſeth to be one, and though he pay for nothing elſe, and yet muſt hee twice bee asked, whether hee will be a Biſhop or no, and hee muſt twice ſay nay, and at the third time take it, as compelled thereunto by his owne will. And in a Stage-play, the people know right well, that he who plaieth the Sowdaine, is percaſe a Sowrer, yet if one ſhould know ſo little good, to ſhew out of ſeaſon what acquaintance hee hath with him, and call him by his owne name while he ſtandeth in his Majeſtie, one of his tormenters might hap to breake his head worthily for marring of the play.

The Raigne and age of King Edward.

(65) The raigne of this young King may well be accounted an inter-regnum, without King, aſwell for his minoritie, being under the rule of a Protector himſelfe, as for the ſhort time wherein he continued the name of a King; which onely was two moneths and ſixteene daies, and in them alſo he ſare uncrowned, without Scepter or Ball, all which Richard aimed at, and perfidiouſly got, before they could come to his head; or into his hands. His age at the death of his Father, and entrance into his Throne, was eleven yeares, five moneths, and five daies, and within three moneths after, was with his Brother ſmothered to death in the Tower of London, as ſhall be ſhewed in his Raigne, of whom we are now by order of ſucceſſion to write.

All the Richards and Dukes of Glouceſter came to untimely deaths. Richard 1. ſlaine with an arrow. Richard 2. murthered at Pomfret. Tho. woodſtocke ſmothered to death. Humfrey murthered at Saint Edmundsbury. Richard 3. ſlaine at Boſworth-field.

Richard, the third ſonne of Richard Duke of Yorke, borne at Fotheringhay Caſtle in the County of Northampton, was firſt honoured with the title of Glouceſter, being the third Duke of that number, and conſequently by uſurpation crowned King of England, the third of that name. A name indeed noted to the Kings ſo called, to be ever ominous; and the title of Glouceſter to thoſe Dukes ever fatall, all of both, dying violent and untimely deaths, which ought to have beene the more fearefull unto Richard, now having poſſeſſion and intereſt in them both. But that not regarded, or deſtiny enforcing, his aſpiring minde gave him no reſt, till his reſtleſſe body found it laſtly in the grave. For his brother deceaſed when his life was moſt deſired, no man in ſhew tooke his death ſo heavily as himſelfe, or tendered the young King with a more honourable reſpect, when as (God knowes) his minde ran upon deepe reaches, how to compaſſe the Wreath for his owne head; which the better to faſhion, he withdrew a while into the North, and at Yorke in moſt ſad and ſolemne manner obſerved the Funerals of the dead King: but howſoever the Maske covered this ſubtle Dukes face from the eye of the multitude; yet Buckingham well knew the ambitious deſire of his aſpiring heart, and indeed was the Dedalus that made him the wings, wherewith he mounted ſo neere unto the Sunne, as that the waxe melting (like the high-minded young Icarus) he caught his laſt fall.

Duke Richard ſubtilely excuſeth for the Crowne.

(2) What intendments they had before the Kings death, is uncertaine, though it may be ſuſpected: but ſure it is, he now gone, the Duke of Buckingham twice ſollicited Glouceſter by his meſſengers in the North, met him at Northampton himſelfe, accompanied him to London, forwarded him in Counſell, and was the firſt actor in this following tragedie. For, firſt making him Protector, procuring his young Nephew forth of Sanctuary, diſabling the young King, baſtardizing them both, perſwading the Citizens, working the Nobility: and all this done, to ſet the Crowne upon crookt Richards head, and ſo moulded their mindes unto the man, as they all became humble petitioners unto him for to accept of the ſame, who in the meane-while had well-conned his owne part, by profuſe liberality, by paſſing-great gravity, by ſingular affability, by miniſtring of juſtice, and by deepe and cloſe deviſes, whereby he wonne to himſelfe the hearts of all, but the Lawyers eſpecially, to ſerve beſt his turne, which was ſo affected, that in the name of all the States of the Realme, a Petition was drawne and preſented him to accept the wearing of the Crowne: the true Copy whereof as we finde it recorded in the Parliament Roll, we have inſerted, and is as followeth:

A Petition exhibited to the Protector to accept of the Crowne.

Memorandum quod quadam billa exhibita fuit coram Domino Rege in Parliamento predicto in hec verba:

Where late heretofore, that is to ſay, before the conſecration, coronation, and inthronization of our Soveraigne Lord the King, Richard the third, a roll of Parchment containing in writing certaine Articles of the Tenor under-written on the behalfe, and in the name of the three Eſtates of this Realme of England, that is to wit, of the Lords Spirituall and Temporall, and of the Commons by name, and divers Lords Spirituall and Temporall, and other Nobles and notable perſons of the Commons in great multitude was preſented, and actually delivered unto our ſaid Soveraigne Lord, the intent and effect expreſſed at large in the ſame Roll: to the which Roll, and to the conſiderations, and inſtant petition comprized in the ſame, our ſaid Soveraigne Lord for the publique weale and tranquility of this Land, benignely aſſented. Now foraſmuch as neither the ſaid three Eſtates, neither the ſaid perſons which in their name preſented, and delivered as it is aforeſaid, the ſaid Roll unto our ſaid Soveraigne Lord the King, were aſſembled in forme of Parliament: by reaſon whereof, divers doubts, queſtions, and ambiguities beene moved, and engendred in the mindes of divers perſons, as it is ſaid: Therefore to the perpetuall memory of the truth, and declaration of the ſame, be it ordained, provided, and eſtabliſhed in this preſent Parliament, that the Tenor of the ſaid Roll, with all the contents of the ſame, preſented as is aboveſaid, and delivered to our foreſaid Soveraigne Lord the King, in the name and in the behalfe of the ſaid three Eſtates out of Parliament, now by the ſame three Eſtates aſſembled in this preſent Parliament, and by authority of the ſame be ratified; enrolled, recorded, approved, and authorized into removing the occaſions of doubts and ambiguities, and to all other lawfull effects that ſhall now thereof enſue: So that all things ſaid, affirmed, ſpecified, deſired and remembred in the ſaid Roll, and in the Tenor of the ſame under-written, in the name of the ſaid three Eſtates, to the effect expreſſed in the ſame Roll be of the like effect, vertue, and force, as if all the ſame things had beene ſo ſaid, affirmed, ſpecified, deſired and remembred in a full Parliament, and by authority of the ſame accepted and approved. The Tenor of the ſaid Roll of Parchment, whereof above is made mention, followeth, and is ſuch.

An Act of Parliament paſſed to eſtabliſh K. Richards election.

All doubts taken away of King Richards election.

To the high and Mighty Prince
Richard Duke of Glouceſter.

Pleaſe it your noble Grace to underſtand the conſiderations, election and petition under-written of us, the Lords Spirituall and Temporall, and Commons of this Realme of England, and thereunto agreeably to give your aſſent to the common and publique weale of this Land, to the comfort and gladneſſe of all the people of the ſame. Firſt, wee conſider how that heretofore in time-paſſed, this Land many yeers ſtood in great proſperity, honour, and tranquilitie, which was cauſed, forſomuch as the King then raigning, uſed and followed the advice and counſell of certaine Lords Spirituall and Temporall, and other perſons of approved fadneſſe, prudence, pollicy and experience, dreading God, and having tender weale and affection to indifferent miniſtration of juſtice, and to the common and publique weale of the Land: Then our Lord God was dread, loved and honoured, then within the Land was peace and tranquility, and among Neighbours concord and charity, then the malice of outward enemies was mightily reſiſted and repreſſed, and the Land honourably defended, with many great and glorious victories, then the entercourſe of Merchants was largely uſed and exerciſed: by which things above-remembred, the Land was greatly enriched, ſo that aſwell the Merchants and Artificers, as other poore people, labouring for their livings in divers occupations, had competent gaine, to the ſuſtentation of them and their houſholds, living without miſerable and intollerable poverty: but afterward, when that ſuch as had the rule and governance of this Land, delighting in adulation and flattery, and led by ſenſuality and concupiſcence, followed the councell of perſons inſolent, vicious, and of inordinate avarice, deſpiſing the counſell of good, vertuous, and prudent perſons, ſuch as above be remembred; The proſperity of this Land dayly decreaſed, ſo that felicity was turned into miſery, and proſperity into adverſity, and the order of policy and of the law of God and Man confounded, whereby it is likely this Realme to fall into extreame miſery and deſolation (which God defend) without due proviſion of covenable remedy be had in this behalfe, in all goodly haſt.

The petition of the Kingdom ſo farre made law-full and authorized by Parliament.

(3) Over this, among other things more ſpeciall, we conſider, how that the time of the raigne of King Edward the fouth late deceaſed, after the ungracious pretenſed marriage (as all England hath cauſe ſo to ſay) made betwixt the ſaid King Edward, and Elizabeth ſometimes wife to Sir John Gray Knight, late naming her ſelfe, and many yeares heretofore Queene of England, the order of all politicke rule was perverted, the lawes of God, and of Gods Church, and alſo the lawes of nature, and of England, and alſo of the laudable cuſtomes and liberties of the ſame, wherein every Engliſh man is inheritor, broken, ſubverted, and contemned, againſt all reaſon and juſtice, ſo that the Land was ruled by ſelfe-will and pleaſure, feare and dread, all manner of equity and law laide apart and deſpiſed, whereof enſued many inconveniences and miſchiefes, as murthers, extortions, and oppreſſions, namely of poore and impotent people, ſo that no man was ſure of his life, land or livelyhood, ne of his Wife, Daughter nor ſervant, every good maiden and woman ſtanding in dread to be ravi∫hed and deſloured: and beſides this, what diſcords, inward barrels, effuſion of Chriſtian-mens bloud, and namely, by the deſtruction of the Nobles bloud of this Land, was had and committed within the ſame, it is evident and notary through all this Realme, unto the great ſorrow and heavineſſe of all true Engliſhmen. And here alſo we conſider, how that the ſaid pretended marriage betwixt the above-named King Edward and Elizabeth Gray, was made of great preſumption without the knowing and aſſent of the Lords of this Land, and alſo by ſorcery and witchcraft committed by the ſaid Elizabeth, and her Mother Iaquet Dutcheſſe of Bedford, as the common opinion of the people, and the publike voice and fame is through all this Land: and hereafter if the cauſe ſhall require, ſhall bee proved sufficiently in time and place convenient. And here also wee consider how that the said pretensed marriage was made privily and secretly, without edition of banes, in a private chamber, a prophane place, and not openly in the face of the Church, after the Law of Gods Church, but contrary thereunto, and the laudable custome of the Church of England. And how also that at the time of contract of the same pretended marriage, and before, and long time after, the said King Edward was and stood married, and troth-plight to one Dame Eleanor Butler, daughter of the old Earle of Shrewsbury, with whom the same Edward had made a pre-contract of Matrimony, long time before he made the said pretensed marriage with the said Elizabeth Gray, in manner and forme aforesaid: which Premisses being true, as in very truth they been true: it appeareth, and followeth evidently, that the said King Edward during his life, and the said Elizabeth lived together sinfully and damnably in adultery, against the law of God and of his Church: And therefore no marvell that the Soveraigne Lord, and the head of this Land, being of such ungodly disposition, and provoking the ire and indignation of our Lord God; such hainous mischiefe and inconveniences as are above-remembred, were used and committed in the Realme among the Subjects. Also it appeareth evidently, and followeth, that all the Issue and Children of the said King Edward, beene bastards, and unable to inherite, or to claime any thing by inheritance, by the law and custome of England.

The rongue of slander is a sharpe arrow.

(4) Moreover, we consider how that afterwards by the three Estates of this Realme assembled in Parliament, holden at Westminster the 17. yeare of the Raigne of the said King Edward the fourth, he then being in possession of the Crowne and royall estate, by Act made in the same Parliament, George Duke of Clarence, brother to the said King Edward now deceased, was convicted and attainted of high treason, as in the same Act is contained more at large, by cause and reason whereof, all the Issue of the said George, was and is disabled and barred of all right and claime that in any case they might have or challenge by inheritance to the Crowne and dignity royall of this Realme, by the ancient law and custome of this same Realme.

George Duke of Clarence and his heires made uncapable of the Crowne.

Over this, we consider that ye be the undoubted sonne and heire of Richard late Duke of Yorke, very inheritour of the said Crowne and dignity-royall, and as in right King of England by way of inheritance: and that at this time the premisses duely considered there is none other person living, but ye only that by right may claime the said Crowne and dignity-royall by way of inheritance, and how that ye be borne within this Land, by reason whereof, as we deeme in our mindes, yee be more naturally inclined to the prosperity and Common-weale of the same: and all the three Estates of the Land have and may have more certaine knowledge of your birth and filiation aforesaid. We consider also the great wit, prudence, justice, princely courage, and the memorable and laudable acts in divers battels, which as we by experience know you heretofore have done, for the salvation and defence of this same Realme; and also the great noblenesse and excellency of your birth and bloud, as of him that is descended of the three most royall houses in Christendome: that is to say, England, France, and Spaine: Wherefore these premisses by us diligently considered, we desiring effectually the peace, tranquility and weale-publique of this Land, and the reduction of the same to the ancient honourable estate and prosperity, and having in your great prudence, justice, princely courage, and excellent vertue, singular confidence, have chosen in all that in us is, and by this our writing choose you High and Mighty Prince our King and Soveraigne Lord, &c. To whom we know for certaine it appertaineth of inheritance so to be chosen. And hereupon wee humbly desire, pray, and require your most noble Grace, that according to this election of us the three Estates of this Land, as by your true inheritance, you will accept and take upon you the said Crowne and royall dignitie, with all things thereunto annexed and appertaining, as to you of right belonging, aswell by inheritance as by lawfull election: and in case yee so doe, wee promise to serve and assist your Highnesse, as true and faithfull subjects, and liege-men; and to live and die with you in this matter, and in every other just quarrell. For certainely, we be determined rather to adventure and commit us to the perill of our lives, and jeopardie of death, then to live in such thraldome and bondage as wee have lived long time heretofore, oppressed and injured by extortions, and new impositions, against the Law of God and man, and the liberty, old pollicy and Lawes of this Realme, wherein every Englishman is inherited. Our LORD GOD, KING of all KINGS, by whose infinite goodnesse and eternall providence all things beene principally governed in this world; lighten your soule, and grant you grace to doe as well in this matter as in all other, that may be according to his will and pleasure, and to the common and publique weale of this Land: so that after great clouds, trouble, stormes, and tempests, the Sun of Iustice and of Grace may shine upon us, to the comfort and gladnesse of all true-hearted Englishmen. Albeit, that the right, title, and estate, which our Soveraigne Lord the King, Richard the third hath to, and in the Crowne and royall dignity of this Realme of England; with all things thereunto within the same Realme, and without it united, annexed and appertaining, bin just and lawfull, as grounded upon the lawes of God, and of nature: and also upon the ancient lawes and laudable customes of this said Realme; and so taken and repured by all such persons as beene learned in the above said lawes and customes: Yet nevertheless, forasmuch as it is considered, that the most part of the people is not sufficiently learned in the abovesaid Lawes and customs, wherby the truth & right in this behalfe, of likelyhood may be hid, and not clearely knowne to all the people, and thereupon put in doubt and question. And over this, how that the Court of Parliament is of such authority, and the people of this Land of such a nature and disposition, as experience teacheth, that manifestation and declaration of any truth or right made by the three Estates of this Realme assembled in Parliament, and by the authoritie of the same, maketh before all other things most feith and certaine, and quieting of mens minds, removeth the occasion of all doubts, and seditious language. Therefore, at the request, and by the assent of the three Estates of this Realme; that is to say, the Lords Spirituall and Temporall, and Commons of this Land, assembled in this present Parliament, by authority of the same, be it pronounced, decreed, and declared, that our said Soveraigne Lord the King was, and is, the very undoubted King of this Realme of England, with all things thereunto within the same Realme, and without it united, annexed, and appertaining, aswell by right of Consanguinity, and inheritance, as by lawfull election, consecration, and coronation. And over this, that at the request, and by the assent and authority aboue-said, be it ordained, enacted and established, that the said Crowne and royall dignity of this Realme, and the inheritance of the same, and all other things thereunto within the Realme, or without, is united, annexed, and now appertaining, rest and abide in the person of our said Soveraigne Lord the King, during his life, and after his decease, in his heires of his body begotten; and in especiall at the request, and by assent and authority above-said, bee it ordained, enacted, established, pronounced, decreed, and declared, that the high and excellent Prince Edward, son of our said Soveraigne Lord the King, bee heire apparant of the same our Soveraigne Lord the King, to succeed to him in the above said Crowne and royall dignity,

All promises were not kept, as afterwards is proved.

(5) These things I have laid forth more at large out of the Parliament Roll, that ye may understand both what and how great matters the power of a Prince, the outward shew of vertue, the wily fetches of Lawyers, fawning hope, pensiue feare, desire of change, and goodly pretenses, are able to effect, in that most wise assembly of all the States of a Kingdome, even against all law and right, so that the saying of Salomon in this State seemed most true, that a living dogge is better then a dead Lyon. But this Richard is not to be accounted worthy to have beene a Soveraigne, had he not beene a Soveraigne as Galba was reputed; who, when he was a Soveraigne, deceived all mens expectation; but most worthy indeed of Soveraignty, had hee not beene transported with ambition (which blasted all his good parts) by lewd practises, and by mischievous meanes, made foule way thereunto: for that by the common consent of all that are wise, he was reckoned in the ranke of bad men, but of good Princes; as indeed King Richard through his short time of raigne is accounted to have beene.

King Richard accepteth the Crowne, and beginneth his raigne with great applause.

(6) The Crowne and Scepter accepted as is said, King Richard upon the twenty fifth of June, went in great pompe unto Westminster hall, and there in the Kings-Bench Court tooke his Seat, saying, that he would take upon him the Crowne in that place, where the King himselfe ought to sit, whose chiefest duety was to administer Iustice to his people, and with a pleasing Oration so tickled the eares of his Auditors, that hee lulled the rurall to thinke that his like had never raigned in England; and to begin himselfe with a pretensed clemency, he pronounced pardon of all offences committed against him; for confirmation wherof, he sent for one Fogge, whom he deadly hated, who for feare of him had lately taken Sanctuary at Westminster, and there in sight of the people, with semblance accordingly, tooke him by the hand saying, that he would be thenceforth his assured in affection; whereat the Commons greatly rejoyced, and with applauses extolled, though others wiser among them tooke it to be but fained, to serve his owne turne. And in his way homeward, whomsoever he met, he saluted: for a mind that knoweth it selfe to be guilty, is in a manner dejected to a servile flattery.

The Nobles of our English Parliament.

(7) King Richard, whose guilty heart was full of suspition, had sent for five thousand Souldiers out of the North to be present in London at his Coronation; these, under the leading of Robin of Ridsdale, came up both evill apparrelled, and worse harnessed, in rusty Armour, neither defencible for proofe, nor scowred for shew: who mustering in Finesbury fields, were with disdaine gazed upon by the beholders. But all things now ready for his Coronation (and much the sooner in that young Edwards provision was conferred upon his) upon the fourth of July, he with his Wife by water came to the Tower, where hee created Estates, ordained the Knights of the Bathe, set at liberty the Archbishop of Yorke, and the Lord Stanley, more for feare then for love; whose sonne the Lord Strange, was then said to be gathering of men in Lancashire, where those Lords have great command.

The new Kings clemency and affability.

(8) But Morton, Bishop of Ely, a firme man unto King Edward, and unpossible to be drawne unto the disinheriting of his children, as was well perceived by the Protector, among others, at the Councell held in the Tower, was left there prisoner, and accused of many great, but unlikely treasons. This man borne in Dorsetshire, and brought up in the Vniversity of Oxford, was from a Doctor of the Arches made a privy Councellor unto King Henry, and after his death allured by King Edward to serve him, was sworne likewise of his Councell, and made one of the Executors of his will: whose insight into the intended designes, the Protector much feared, and therefore having him fast, minded so to keepe him, when hee released others laide in the Tower for the like feare. But the reverence of the man, or undeservednesse of his wrongs, moved so the affection of the Oxford Academians, that they directed to the King (who professed much love to that Vniversity) a petitory Latine Epistle, no lesse eloquent and pithy, then circumspect and wary, wherein they thus pleaded for his liberty.

attendance of the Nobility, the King rode through London, ſo as a more royall had not beene ſeene at a-

Dukes, nine Earles, two Viſcounts, twenty Lords, ſeaventy eight Knights, all of them moſt richly furniſhed, whereof the Duke of Buckingham ſo farre exceeded, that the capariſon of his Horſe was ſo charged with embroydered worke of gold, as it was born up from the ground by certaine his footemen thereto appointed. And contrary to my owne affections, or manner of my former proceedings, I will yet continue the moſt honourable offices performed at his royall enthroning with no little Admiration, how theſe Lords aſſembled to ſet the Crowne upon the young Princes head, were ſo ſuddainely carried to Crowne his Protector, and that upon ſuch falſe and ſlanderous pretences, as every one of them ſaw his Title to be meerely an unjuſt uſurpation, but in them may be ſeene, that we are all the Sonnes of Adam, ſelfe and Queene upon ray Cloth, both of them barefooted, went unto King Edwards ſhrine in Saint Pe- their degree, the trumpets and Heraulds marſhalling the way, the Croſſe with a ſolemne proceſſion followed, the Prieſts in fine ſurpleſſes and gray Amyſſes upon them, the Biſhops and Abbots in rich Copes, all of them mytred, and carrying their Croſſes in their hands; next came the Earle of Huntington bearing a paire of gilt ſpurres, ſignifying Knighthood; after whom came the Earle of Bedford, who bare Saint Edwards ſtaffe for a Relique, then followed the Earle of Northumberland with a naked pointles ſword in his hand betokening Mercy, next whom the Lord Stan- ley bare the Mace of the Conſtableſhip, upon whoſe right hand the Earle of Kent bare a naked pointed ſword, and on his left-hand the Lord Lovell the like

upon whoſe right hand went the Gentleman-Vſher of the Kings privy Chamber, and on his left hand the Next unto whom went the Duke of Norfolke, bearing

Richard himſelfe came, in a Surcote and Robe of purple Velvet; having over his head a Canopie borne by

Duke of Buckingham bare the Kings traine, and to ſignifie the office of high Steward of England, hee bare a White Staffe in his hand.

(13) Then followed the Queenes traine: before whom was borne the Scepter, the Ivory Rod with the Dove and the Crowne: her ſelfe apparelled in Robes like the Kings, under a rich Canopie, at every corner thereof a bell of gold. On her head ſhee ware a circlet ſet full of precious ſtones, the Counteſſe of Rich- mond bearing her traine; the Dutcheſſe of Norfolke and Suffolke in their Coronets attendents, with twenty Ladies of Eſtate moſt richly attired. In this order they paſſed the Pallace into the Abbey, and aſcen-ding to the high Altar there ſhifted their Robes, and having other Robes open in divers places from the middle upward, were both of them annointed, and Crowned, he with Saint Edwards Crowne, having the Scepter delivered into his left hand, and the Ball with the Croſſe, a token of Monarchie in his right; the Queene had a Scepter given into her right hand, and the Iuory Dove in her left; then after the Sacrament received (having the hoſt divided betwixt them) they both offered at S. Edwards ſhrine,
and thus done, in the ſame Order and State as they came, returned to Weſtminſter-Hall, and there held a moſt Princely feaſt. Whereof let Hall and Graſton tell you for me.

fell thicke upon the necke of each other, for as the time of his raigne there never ceaſed death and ſlaughter, till his owne deſtruction ended it. Yet as he finiſhed his daies with the beſt death, and the moſt righteous, that is to ſay, his owne: ſo began he with the moſt pitteous and wicked, I meane the lamentable murther of his innocent Nephewes, the young King and his tender Brother; whoſe deaths and ſinall miffortunes have neverthelеſſe come ſo farre in queſti-on, that ſome remaine yet in doubt, whether they were in his dayes deſtroyed or no. Not for that one-ly, that Perkin Warbecke, by the malice of many, and the folly of more, ſo long a time abuſing the world, was aſwell with Princes, as the other poore people, reputed and taken for the younger of theſe two: but for that alſo as all things were in late dayes ſo covertily demeaned, one thing pretended and another done, that there was nothing ſo plaine and openly proved, but for the common cuſtome and cloſe covert dealing, men had it ever inwardly in ſuſpect, as many

Howbeit concerning the opinion, with the occations

ranne. For albeit the Barke of his begun adventures, had without perill well paſſed the ſtraights, and now got ſea-roome to ſpread Saile at will; yet being under Gale, and at Fortunes diſpoſe, he feared the guſt of every winde: at leaſt-wiſe ſuſpected that his young Nephewes living, would ſtay the courſe of his deepe reaches, as doth the little fiſh Remora, who holdeth (as at Anchor) the biggeſt ſhip under Saile. His inward ſtudy therefore ſtill forged, how ſoever his outward countenance was carried, to cleare his paſſage by taking thoſe dangerous lets away, well knowing, that his little Nephewes enjoying their lives, men would be medling with their downe-caſt cauſe, and account him an Vſurper without all right to the Realme. To ſtop which ſtreame, no no other courſe could he finde, but to cut off the current by which it ranne, as though the killing of his Kinſmen could better his bad claime, or unkindly murther make him a kindly King. But being reſol-ved, he forthwith ſent one John Greene, a ſervant in eſpeciall truſt, unto Sir Robert Brakenburie Conſtable of the Tower, with a letter of credence, that the ſame Sir Robert ſhould in any wiſe put the two children to death.

(16) This Greene thus poſted to London, delive-red his errand unto Brakenbury, whom he found kneeling at his Oraizons before Image of our La-dy in the Tower, the buſineſſe being of ſuch weight as the King muſt bee ſerved before hee had ended with his Saint. The Conſtable reading the Letter, and perceiving the bloudy intent of the King, anſwe-red plainly, he would never put thoſe innocent babes unto death, to dye therefore himſelfe. With which anſwere John Greene returning, recounted the ſame to King Richard being at Warwicke, yet in his way to Glouceſter, wherewith he was marvellouſly per-plexed, and thereat tooke ſuch diſpleaſure, that the ſame night he ſaid to a ſecret Page of his: Ah whom ſhall a man truſt? thoſe that I have brought up my ſelfe, thoſe that I have weened would moſt ſurely ſerve mee, even thoſe faile mee, and at my commandement will doe nothing. Sir, quoth the Page, there lyeth one on your Pallet without, that I dare well ſay, to doe your Grace pleaſure, the thing were right hard that hee would refuſe; meaning this by Sir Iames Tirrell, who was a man of a goodly Perſonage, and for Natures gifts worthy to have ſerved a much bet-ter Prince, if he had well ſerved God, and by grace obtained as much truth and good will, as hee had ſtrength and wit.

(17) The man had an high heart, and ſore lon-ged upward, not riſing yet ſo faſt as he hoped, be-ing hindred and kept under by the meanes of Sir Richard Ratcliffe, and Sir William Catesby, who long-ing for no more partners of the Princes favour, and namely, not for him, whoſe pride they knew would beare no Peere, kept him by ſecret drifts out of all ſecret truſt, which thing this Page had well marked and knowne: wherefore this occaſion offered of ve-ry ſpeciall friendſhip, hee tooke his time to put him forward, and by ſuch wiſe to doe him good, that all the enemies he had, except the Divell himſelfe could never have done him ſo much hurt. For upon this Pages words, King Richard aroſe (for this communi-cation had hee ſitting at the drught, a convenient Carpet for ſuch a Councell) and came out into a Pal-let-Chamber, where he found in bed, Sir Iames and Sir Thomas Tirrels, of perſons much like, and bre-thren in bloud, but nothing of kinne in conditions: Then ſaid the King merrily to them, What Sirs, bee yee in bed ſo ſoone? and calling up Sir Iames, brake to him ſecretly his minde in this michievous mat-ter, in which he found him nothing ſtrange. Where-fore on the morrow he ſent him to Brakenbury with a Letter, by which he was commanded to deliver Sir Iames all the keyes of the Tower for one nignt, to the end he might accompliſh there the kings plea-ſure in ſuch things as hee had given him in comman-dement. After which Letter delivered, and the keyes received, Sir Iames appointed the night next enſuing to deſtroy them, deviſing before, and preparing the meanes.

(18) The Prince in the Tower ſlenderly attended; and altogether neglected by the Nobility, laſtly, had newes that his Vncle had left the name of Protector, and taking upon him the Title of King, who with ful conſent of the Lords was to be crowned within a few dayes following, with the ſame Crowne, and in the like eſtate as had been provided for his ſolemni-tie, whereat the dejected innocent ſighed and ſaid, Alaſſe, I would my Vncle would let mee enjoy my life yet, though I loſe both my Kingdome and Crowne, Which words hee pronounced with ſuch a feeling feare, as much moved the Relater to pitty, and to perſwade him with the beſt comforts he could: but forthwith the Prince and his brother were both ſhut up, and all attendants removed from them, onely one called Blacke-Will, or William Slaughter excep-ted, who was ſet to ſerve them, and ſee them ſure. After which time the Prince never tyed his points, nor cared for himſelfe, but with that young babe his brother lingered with thought and heavineſſe, till their traiterous deathes delivered them out of that wretchedneſſe: for the execution whereof, Tirrell appointed Miles Forreſt, one of the foure that kept them, a Fellow fleſhed in murther before-time: To whom hee joyned one John Dighton his Horſe-keeper, a bigge, broad, ſquare knave.

(19) About mid-night (all others being removed from them,) this Miles Forreſt, and John Dighton, came into the Chamber, and ſuddenly wrapped up the ſeely children in the bed-cloathes, where they lay keeping by force the Feather-bed and pillowes hard upon their mouthes that they were therein ſmoothe-red to death, and gave up to God their innocent ſouls into the joyes of Heaven, leaving their bodies unto the Tormentors dead in the bed: which after theſe monſtrous wretches perceived, firſt by the ſtrugling with the paines of death, and after long lying ſtill to be throughly diſpatched, they laide their bodies na-ked out upon the bed, and then fetched Sir Iames their Inſtigator, to ſee them, who cauſed theſe mur-therers to bury them at the Staires foot, ſomewhat deepe in the ground, under a great heape of ſtones. Then rode Sir Iames in haſte to the King, unto whom he ſhewed the manner of their death, and place of buriall, which newes was ſo welcome to his wicked heart, as hee greatly rejoyced, and with great thankes dubbed (as ſome hold) this his mercileſſe inſtrument, Knight. But the place of their buriall hee liked not, ſaying, that vile corner ſhould not containe the bo-dies of thoſe Princes, his Nephewes, and commanded them a better place for buriall, becauſe they were the ſons of a King. Whereupon the Priеſt of the Tower tooke up the bodies; and ſecretly interred them in ſuch place, which by the occaſion of his death could never ſince come to light.

(20) The continuer of Iohn Harding tels us, from the report of others, that King Richard cauſed Sir Robert Brakenburies Prieſt to cloſe their dead Corpes in Lead, and ſo to put them in a Coffin full of holes, and hooked at the ends with two hookes of Iron, and ſo to caſt them into a place called the Black-deepes at the Thames mouth, whereby they ſhould never riſe up, or be any more ſeene. Wherefore they were buried, thus they dyed, and by theſe murtherers. For very certaine it is, and well knowne, that at ſuch time as Sir Iames Tirrell was in the Tower, for Treaſon committed againſt King Henry the ſeaventh, both Dighton and hee were examined, and confeſſed the murther in manner as is ſaid, but whither their bo-dies were removed they could not ſay. And thus as I have learned of them that knew much, and little cauſe had to lye, were theſe two Noble Princes, theſe innocent tender children, born of moſt royall bloud, brought up in great wealth, likely to have lived, to have raigned, and ruled in the Realme, by traiterous tyranny taken, deprived of their eſtates, ſhortly ſhut up in prison, and impiously murdered, and the body cast out God wot where, by the cruell ambition of their vnnaturall Vncle, and his hellish Tormentors. Which things on every part well pondered; God never gave this world a more notable example, neither in what vnsurety standeth this worldly weale, or what mischiefe worketh the proud enterprise of an high heart, or finally, what wretched end ensueth such barbarous cruelty.

Gods iustice and reuenge vpon the murtherers.

(20) For first to begin with the Ministers, Miles Forrest, at Saint Martins, peece-meale rotted away Sir Iames Tyrrill dyed at Tower-hill for Treason; Dighton indeed walketh on alive in good possibility to be hanged ere he die, living at Calice no lesse distained and hated then pointed at of all. King Richard himselfe as yee shall hereafter heare, was slaine in the field, hacked and hewed of his enemies hands, carried on horse-backe dead, his haire in despite torne, and tugged like a Curre dogge: and the mischiefe that he tooke was within lesse then three yeares of the mischiefe that he did, and yet all the meane time spent in much paine and trouble outward, and much feare, anguish, and sorrow within. For I have heard by credible report of such as were secret with his Chamberlaine, that after this abominable deed done, he never had quiet in his minde: hee never thought himselfe sure: but where he went abroad, his eyes ever whirled about, his body privily fenced, his hand ever on his dagger, his countenance and manner like one alwayes ready to strike againe, he tooke ill rest a-nights, lay long waking and musing, sore wearied with care and watch, rather slumbred then slept, troubled with fearefull dreames, suddainely sometimes started up, leapt out of his bed, and ranne about the Chamber, so was his restlesse heart continually tossed and tumbled with the teadious impression & stormy remembrance of his abominable deed. Neither had he in his best, any time of quiet, for immediately began the conspiracy (or rather good confideration) betweene the Duke of Buckingham, and divers other Gentlemen against him.

Tab. Hardin. Reuenge of murder repaid.

The guilty conficience of King Richard.

(21) Which Duke as soone as Glouceſter upon the death of King Edward came to Yorke, sent thither in secret wise a trusty servant of his, named Perſall, to assure him, that he would take his part in this his new world, and if need were, would waite upon him with a thousand good-fellowes: and againe sent offers of the like unto Nottingham, whither the Protector from Yorke, with many Gentleman of the North Countrey was come, and on the way to London-ward in secret manner met him himselfe, but at Northampton openly with three hundred horse: and from thence still continued with him, being a partner of all his deuises, till that after his Coronation they departed (as it seemed) very great friends at Glouceſter, from whence as soone as the Duke came home, he so lightly turned from him, and so highly conspired against him, that a man would marvell whereof the change grew. And surely the occasion of their variance is of divers men, diverſly reported; Some have said, that the Duke a little before the Coronation, among other things, required of the Protector, the Duke of *Hertford*s Lands, to the which he pretended himselfe just inheritor. And forasmuch as the Title which he claimed by inheritance, was somewhat interlaced with the title of the Crowne, by the line of King Henry before deprived, the Protector conceived such indignation, that he rejected the Dukes request, with many spitefull and minatory words, which so wounded his heart with hatred and mistrust, that he never after could endure to looke aright on King Richard, but ever feared his owne life, so farre forth, that when the Protector rode through London towards his Coronation, he fained himselfe sicke, because hee would not ride with him: And the other taking it in evill part, sent him word to rise, and come ride, or he would make him to be carried. Whereupon hee rode on with an evill will, and that notwithstanding, on the morrow rose from the Feast, fayning himselfe sick; whereat King Richard said, it was done in hatred and despite of him. And they say, that ever after continually each of them lived in such hatred and distrust of other, as the Duke verily looked to have beene murthered at Glouceſter: from which nevertheleſſe he in faire manner departed. But surely some right secret, at this day, deny this: and many right wise men thinke it unlikely (the deepe dissembling nature of both those men considered, and what need in that greene world the Protector had of the Duke, and in what perill the Duke stood, if he fell once in suspition of the Tyrant) that either the Protector would give the Duke, occasion of displeasure, or the Duke the Protector occasion of mistrust. And verily men thinke, that if King Richard had any such conceived opinion, hee would never have suffered the Duke to have escaped his hands.

The forward affection of the Duke of Buckingham towards the Duke of Glouceſter.

(22) The very truth is, Buckingham was high-minded man, and could evill beare the glory of another; so that I have heard of some that saw it, that the Duke at such time as the Crowne was first set upon the Protectors head, his eye could not abide the sight thereof, but wried his face another way. But men say, that he was of truth not well at ease, which to King Richard was well knowne, and nothing ill taken, nor any demaund of the Dukes uncourteously rejected, but he both with great gifts and high behests, in most loving and trusty manner, departed at Glouceſter. But soone after his comming home to Brecknocke, having there in custody by the comaundement of King Richard, Doctor Morton Bishop of Ely, who (yee before heard) was taken in the Counsell at the Tower, waxed with him familiar: whose wisedome abused his pride to his owne deliverance, and the Dukes destruction.

The deuises of Bishop Morton.

(23) This Bishop was a man of great naturall wit, very well learned, and honourable in behaviour, lacking no wise wayes to win favour: hee had beene fast upon the part of King Henry, while that part was in wealth; and naytheleſſe left it not, nor forsooke it in woe, but fled the Realme with Queene Margaret and Prince Edward, while King Edward had Henry in prison, and never came home but to the field. After which lost, and that side utterly subdued, the other for his fast faith and wiſedome not onely was content to receive him, but also wooed him to come, and had him from thence-forth both in great secret truſt, and very speciall favour, which hee nothing deceived. For hee being (as you have heard) after King Edwards death, first taken by the Tyrant for his truth to the King, found the meanes to set this Duke in his top, joyned Gentlemen together in aide of Earle Henry, deviſing first the marriage betweene him and King Edwards daughter: by which his faith, he declared the good service to both his masters at once, with infinite benefite to the Realme, by the conjuction of those two blouds in one; whose severall Titles had long time disquieted the Land; he fled the Realme, went to Rome, never minding more to meddle with the world, till the noble Prince King Henry the seaventh got him home againe, made him Archbishop of Canterbury and Chancellour of England, whereunto the Pope joyned the honour of a Cardinall. Thus living many dayes in as much honour as one man might well wish, ended them so godly, that his death with Gods mercy, well changed his life.

The Story of Bishop Morton.

(24) This man therefore, as I was about to tell you, by the long & often alternate proofe, as well of prosperitie as adverse fortunes, had gotten by great experience (the very mother or mistresse of Wisedome) a deepe insight in politique worldly drifts: Whereby perceiving now this Duke glad to commune with him, fed him with faire words, and many pleasant praises. And perceiving by the processe of their communication, the Dukes pride now and then balk out a little bread of envie, towards the glory of the King, and thereby feeling him easie to fall out, out, if the matter were well handled: hee craftily sought the wayes to pricke him forward, taking alwayes the occasion of his comming, and keeping himselfe so close within his bounds, that he rather seemed to follow then to leade him. For when the Duke first began to praise and boast of the King, and shew how much profit the Realme should take by his Raigne, Morton answered thus: Surely my Lord, folly it were for me to lie, for if I would sweare the contrary, your Lordship would not ween I beleeve, but that if the world would have gone, as I could have wished, King Henries son had had the Crowne, and not King Edward. But after that God had ordered him to lose it, and King Edward to raigne, I was never so mad, that I would with a dead man strive against a quicke. So was I to King Edward a faithfull Chaplaine, and glad would have beene that his Childe should have succeeded him. Howbeit, if the secret judgement of God have otherwise provided, I purpose not to spurne against the pricke, nor labour to set up, that God purteth downe. And as for the late Protector and now King, and even there he left: saying, that he had already medled too much with the world, and would from that day meddle with his Booke, and his Beades, and no further.

The Dukes protestation of secrecy.

(24) Then longed the Duke sore to heare what he would have said, because he ended with the King, and there so sodainely stopped, and exhorted him so familiarly, betweene them twaine, to be bold to say whatsoever he thought, whereof he faithfully promised there should never come hurt, and peradventure more good then hee would weene, and that himselfe intended to use his faithfull, secret advise and counsell, which he said was the onely cause for which hee procured of the King to have him in his custody, where hee might account himselfe at home, and else had hee beene put in the hands of them with whom he should not have found the like favour. The Bishop right humbly thanked him and said: In good faith my Lord, I love not to talke much of Princes, as a thing not all out of perill, though the word be without fault. For as much as it shall nor be taken as the party meant it, but as it pleaseth the Prince to construe it. And ever I thinke on Aesops Tale, that when the Lion had proclaimed upon paine of death there should no horned Beast abide in the Wood, one that had in his fore-head a bunch of flesh, fled away a great pace. The Foxe who saw him runne so fast, asked him whither hee made all that haste? and he answered, In faith, I neither wot, nor recke, so I were once hence, because of this Proclamation made against horned beasts. What foole (quoth the Foxe) thou maist abide well enough, the Lyon meant not thee, for it is no horne that is in thy head. No marry (quoth he) that wot I well enough, but what if he call it a horne, where am I then? The Duke laughed merrily at the Tale, and said, my Lord I warrant you, neither the Lyon nor the Boare shall picke any matter at any thing here spoken, for it shall never come to their eares. In good faith Sir, said the Bishop, if it did, the thing that I was about to say, (taken as well as afore God I meant it) could deserve but thankes; and yet taken as I weene it would, might happily turne me to little good, and you to lesse. Then longed the Duke yet more to wit what it was; whereupon the Bishop said, in good faith my Lord, as for the late Protector, sith hee is now King in possession, I purpose not to dispute his title, but for the weale of this Realme, whereof his Grace hath now the governance, and my selfe am a poore member, I was about to wish, that to those good abilities, whereof hee hath already right many, little needing my praise; it might yet have pleased God for the better store, to have given him some of such other excellent vertues meete for the rule of a Realme as our Lord hath planted in the person of your Grace: and there left againe.

(25) The Duke somewhat marvelling at his suddaine pauses: said, My Lord, I note your often breathings and suddaine stopping in your communication; so that to my intelligence, your words neither come to any direct or perfect sentence in conclusion, whereby either I might have knowledge what your intent is now towards the King, or what affection you beare towards mee. For the comparison of good qualities ascribed to us both, maketh mee not a little to muse, thinking that you have some other privie imagination imprinted in your heart, which you bee abashed to disclose, and specially to me, which on mine honour doe affure you to bee as secret in this case as the deafe and dumb person to the Singer, or the Tree to the Hunter. The Bishop being somewhat bolder, considering the Dukes promise, but most of all animated, because hee knew the Duke desirous to be magnified, and also he perceived the inward hatred which hee bare towards King Richard, he opened his stomacke to the bottome, and said: My singular good Lord, sith the time of my captivitie, which being in your Graces custody, I may rather call it a liberty, then a strait imprisonment, in avoyding of idlenesse, Mother of all Vices, in reading Bookes and ancient Pamphlets, I have found this Sentence written, That no man is borne free and at liberty of himselfe onely: for one part of dutie he oweth to his Parents, another part to his friends and kindred; but the native Countrey in the which he first tasted this pleasant and flattering World, demandeth a debt not to be forgotten. Which saying, causeth me to consider in what case the Realme, my native Countrey, now standeth; and in what estate and assurance before this time it hath continued; what Governour we now have, and what Ruler we might have; for I plainely perceive (the Realme being sin this case) must needs decay, and be brought to confusion: but one hope I have, that is, when I consider your Noble Perſonage, your justice and indifference, your fervent zeale, and ardent love towards your naturall Countrey; and in like manner, the love of your Countrey towards you, the great learning, pregnant wit, and eloquence, which so much doth abound in your person; I must needes thinke this Realme fortunate, which hath such a Prince in store, meete and apt to be Governour. But on the other side, when I call to memory the good qualites of the late Protector, and now called King, so violated by tyranny, so altered by usurped authority, and so clouded by blinde ambition, I must needs say, that he is neither meet to be King of so Noble a Realme, nor so famous a Realme meet to be governed by such a Tyrant. Was not his first enterprize to obtaine the Crowne, begun by the murther of divers Perſonages? did hee not secondarily proceed against his owne naturall mother; declaring her openly to be a woman given to carnall affection and dissolute living? declaring furthermore, his two brethren, and two Nephewes, to be bastards, and to be borne in adultery? yet not contented, after he had obtained the Garland, he caused the two poore Innocents his Nephewes, committed to him to be most shamefully murthered: the bloud of which little Babes daily cryed to God from the earth for vengeance. What furety can be in this Land to any person, either for life or goods, under such a cruell Prince, which regardeth not the destruction of his owne bloud, and much lesse the losse of others? But now to conclude, what I meane towards your Noble person, I say and affirm, if you love God, your linage, or your native Countrey, you muſt your selfe take upon you the Crowne of this Realme, both for the maintenance of the honour of the same, as also for the deliverance of your naturall Country-men from the bondage of such a Tyrant. And if your selfe will refuse to take upon you the Crowne of this Realme, then I adjure you by the faith you owe unto God, to devise some wayes how this Realme may be brought to some convenient Regiment, under some good Governour. ended his saying, the Duke sighed, and spake not of a great while, so that night they communed no more.

(26) The next day the Duke sent for the Bishop, to whom he said, My Lord of Ely, I must needs in heart thinke, and with mouth confesse, that you bee a sure friend, a trusty counsellor, and a very lover of your Countrey. And sith that at our last communication, you have disclosed the secrets of your heart touching the now Vsurper of the Crowne, and also have a little touched the advancement of the two noble Families of Yorke and Lancaster, I shall likewise declare unto you my priuy intents and secret cogitations. And to begin, when King Edward was deceased, I then began to study, and with deliberation to ponder in what manner this Realme should be governed: I perswaded with my selfe to take part with the Duke of Glouceſter, whom I thought to be as cleane without diffimulation, as tractable without injurie, and so by my meanes he was made Protector both of the King and Realme; which authority being once gotten, hee never ceased privily to require mee and other Lords, as well Spirituall as temporall, that he might take upon him the Crowne, till the Prince came to the age of foure and twenty yeares, and were able to governe the Realme as a sufficient King: which thing, when hee saw me somewhat sticke at, he then brought in instruments, authenticke Doctors, Proctors, and Notaries of the Law, with depositions of divers witnesses, testifying King Edwards Children to be bastards: which depositions then I thought to be as true, as now I know them to be fained. When the said depositions were before us read, and diligently heard, he stood up bare-headed, saying: Well my Lords, euen'as I and you would that my Nephewes ſhould haue no wrong: ſo I pray you doe mee nothing but right, for theſe witneſſes and sayings of famous Doctors bee true: For I am onely the vndubitate heire to Richard Plantagines Duke of Yorke, adjudged to be the very heire of the Crowne of this Realme by authority of Parliament. Which things so by learned men for verity to us declared, caused me and others to take him for our lawfull and undoubted Prince, and Soveraigne Lord. So againe, by my ayde, hee of a Protector was made a King: but when he was once crowned King, and in full possession of the Realme, hee cast away his old conditions. For, when I my selfe sued to him for my part of the Earle of Hertford Lands, which his brother Edward wrongfully detained from mee, and also required to have the office of the high Constableship of England, as divers of my noble Ancestors before this time have had, & in long discent continued; In this my first suite, he did not onely first delay mee, and afterwards deny mee, but gave me such unkinde words, as though I had never furthered him: all which I suffered patiently. But when I was informed of the death of the two young Innocents, O Lord, my heart inwardly grudged, insomuch as I abhorred the sight of him; I tooke my leave of the Court, and returned to Brecknocke to you, but in my journey as I came, I had divers imaginations how to deprive this unnaturall Vncle. First, I fantasied, that if I list to take upon me the Crowne, now was the way made plaine, and occasion given. For I well saw he was disdained of the Lords Temporall, and accursed of the Lords Spirituall. After divers cogitations of this matter, as I rode betweene Worceſter and Bridgenorth, I encountred with the Lady Margaret Countesse of Richmond, now wife to the Lord Stanley, who is the very daughter, and sole heire to John Duke of Sommerſet, my Grand-fathers elder brother, so that shee and her sonne Henry Earle of Richmond be both betweene me and the gate, to enter into the Majesty-royall, and getting of the Crown; and when we had a little communed concerning her son, and were departed, I then began to dispute with my selfe, whether I were best to take it upon me, by the election of the Nobility and Communalty, or to take it by power. Thus standing in a wavering ambiguity, I considered first, the office, duety, and paine of a King, which surely I thinke that no mortall man can justly and truely observe, except he be elected of God, as King David was.

Semblably my Cosin the Earle of Richmond, his aydes and kinsfolkes will surely attempt either to bite, or to pierce mee on the other side, so that my life and rule should ever hang unquiet in doubt of death or deposition: And if the said two Linages of Yorke and Lancaster should joyne in one against me, then were I surely matched. Wherefore I have clearely determined utterly to relinquish all imaginations concerning the obtaining of the Crowne. For, as I tolde you the Countesse of Richmond in my returne from the new-named King, meeting mee in the high way, prayed mee first for kindreds sake, secondly, for the love I bare to my Grand-father Duke Humfrey, who was sworne-brother to her father, to move the King to be good to her sonne Henry Earle of Richmond, and to license him with his favour to returne againe into England, and if it were his pleasure so to doe, she promised that the Earle her sonne should marry one of the Kings daughters at the appointment of the King, without any thing demaunded for the said espousals, but onely the Kings favour, which requeſt I soone over-passed, and departed. But after in my lodging I called to memory more of that matter, and now am bent, that the Earle of Richmond, heire of the House of Lancaſter, shall take to wife Lady Elizabeth, eldest daughter to King Edward, by the which marriage both of the Houses of Yorke and Lancaster may be united in one.

(28) When the Duke had said, Bishop Morton who ever favoured the House of Lancaſter, was wondrous joyfull, for all his imagination tended to this effect; and left the Dukes courage should asswage, or his mindealter, he said to the Duke: My Lord of Buckingham, sith by Gods provision, and your incomparable wisedome, this noble conjunction is first moved, it is necessary to consider what persons we shall first make privy of this politique conclusion. By my troth (quoth the Duke) we will begin with my Lady of Richmond the Earles Mother, which knoweth where he is in Britaine: sith you will begin that way (said the Bishop) I have an old friend with the Countesse, called Reinold Bray, for whom I shall send, if it be your pleasure: so the Bishop wrote for him to come to Brecknocke, who strait came backe with the messenger, where the Duke and Bishop declared what they had devised for the preferment of the Earle of Richmond, sonne to his Lady and Mistresse: willing her first to compasse how to obtaine the good will of Queene Elizabeth, and also of her eldest daughter: and after secretly to send to her son in Britaine, to declare what high honour was prepared for him, if he would sweare to marry the Lady Elizabeth assoone as hee was King of the Realme. With which conclusion, Reinold Bray, with a glad heart, returned to the Countesse his Lady. Bray thus departed, the Bishop told the Duke, that if he were in his Isle of Ely, he could make many friends to further their enterprise. The Duke knew this to be true, but yet loth to lose the Society of such a counsellor, gave him faire words, saying, he should shortly depart well accompanied for feare of enemies, but the Bishop ere the Dukes Company were assembled, secretly disguised, in a night departed and came to Ely, where he found money and friends, and then sailed into Flaunders, where hee did the Earle of Richmond good service.

wherefore shee devised a meanes how to breake this matter to Queene Elizabeth, being then in Sanctuary at Weſtminſter, and having in her family a certaine Welshman called Lewis, learned in Physicke, now having opportunitie to breake her minde unto him, declared that the time was come, that her Sonne should be joyned in marriage with Lady Elizabeth, daughter and heire to King Edward: and that King Richard should out of all honour and estate be dejected, and required him to goe to Queene Elizabeth not as a messenger, but as one that came friendly to visite her, and as time and place should serve to make her privy of this devise. This Physician with good diligence repaired to the Queene, and when he saw time convenient, said unto her: Madame, although my imagination be very simple, yet for the entire affection I beare to you and to your children, I am so bold to utter unto you a secret conceit, which I have compassed in my braine. When I remember the great losse which you have sustained by the death of your loving Husband, and the great sorrow that you have suffered by the cruell murder of your innocent children, I can no lesse doe, then daily study how to bring your heart to comfort, and also to revenge the quarrell of you and your children, on that cruell Tyrant King Richard. And first confider what battell, and what mischiefe have risen by the diffention betweene the two Houses of Yorke and Lancaſter, which two families if they may be joyned in one, I doubt not but that your line shall be againe restored to your great joy and comfort: You know, Madame, that of the house of Lancaſter, the Earle of Richmond is next of bloud, and to the house of Yorke your daughters now are heires. If you could devise the meanes how to couple your eldest daughter with the Earle of Richmond in matrimony, no doubt, but that the Vsurper should shortly be depoſed, and your heire againe to her right restored.

(35) Richard thus farre proceeded, and no enemy seene, his hopes were encreased, and feares daily lesse; yet being a Prince politique and vigilant, he commanded the Ports to be securely kept, and knowing that Buckingham was not fled with the rest, made Proclamation for the apprehending of that Duke, promising a thousand pound to the man that could bring him forth, with pardon of his faults, to enjoy the Kings favour, and if he were a Bond-man, presently to be made free. Banister minding the present, and forgetting what was past, spread his lap first to receive this golden shower, and in hope of this gaine, made no conscience to betray his owne Lord, who had now laid his life upon trust in his hands: hee therefore repayring to the Sheriffe of Shrewsbury, revealed the Duke, who disguised like a poore Countriman, and digging in a grove neere unto Banisters House, was apprehended, and with a great Guard of men was brought unto Salisbury, where King Richard then lay, and where without arraignement or judgement, upon the second of November he lost his head: whose death was the lesse lamented, for that himselfe had beene the chiefe Instrument to set the Crowne wrongfully upon Richards head: and yet the treachery of Banister was most severely punished, as many have observed, nor onely in the losse of his reward promised, which he never had, and infamy received, never after shaken off; but also in himselfe and children, as are thus reported; his eldest sonne and heire fell mad, and dyed so distracted in a Boares Stye: his second sonne became deformed in his limmes, and fell lame; his third sonne was drowned in a small puddle of water; his eldest daughter was sodainly strucke with a foule leprosie, and himselfe being of extreame age, was arraigned and found guiltie of murder, and by his Clergie saved his life.

Buckingham beheaded.

A Commotion in Kent.

(36) An other Commotion at the same time was in Kent, where George Browne and Iohn Gilford Knights, Fogge, Scot, Clifford, and Bonting, with five thousand men attempted great matters at Gravesend, but hearing of the Duke of Buckinghams surprise, dispersed themselves for that time. But when King Richard perceived how hee was every where beset, he sent one Thomas Hutton vnto Francis Duke of Britaine, with proffers of gold to circumvent and imprison Earle Henry, who as hee feared was too well friended in those forraine parts, which thing indeed this Hutton well perceived, and so to the King reported, that the Duke was nothing forward to bite at this baite, whereupon, those that lately fled England, were indited of treason, and other of Henries factions beheaded, whereof Sir George Browne, and Sir Roger Clifford Knights, with foure others were beheaded at London, and at Exceter for the like cause dyed Sir Thomas Sentleger, who had married Lady Anne Dutchesse of Exceiter, King Richards own sister, with others; so jealous was the King of his usurped Crowne; and that nothing should be laid to unprovident fore-sight, the coasts he stored with Armies of men, furnished the Ports with store of Provision, and made all things ready to withstand Earle Henries arrivall. Who now having gotten ayde of five thousand Britaines, with forty vessels well furnished, set saile from thence the twelfth of October, but was taken with so terrible a tempest, that his Fleet was disparkled, some into Normandy, and some compelled to returne into Britaine, onely the Earles Ship with one other kept the Seas, being sore tossed all night, and in the morning arrived in the mouth of Poole in the Countie of Dorset, where he might behold the Shore full of men shining in armour, to his great amazement, whereupon hee sent out his Ship-boat to know whether they were friends or enemies; their answer was, that they were thither appointed by the Duke of Buckingham, to attend the comming of the Earle of Richmond, to conduct him in safetie to the Duke, who lay encamped not far off, that so joyning their forces, they might prosecute Richard the Vsurper, who being in a manner destitute of men, was fore distracted, and desperate in his owne designes. These smooth untruths notwithstanding Earle Henry avoided, and with a forward gale returned to Normandy, whence he sent Messengers unto young Charles King of France, whose father King Lewis was lately departed this life, to have his safe conduct to returne into Britaine, which easily was granted with favourable complements returned to the Earle. Lord Henry thus crossed by Sea, had present newes of Buckinghams surprise and death, with the flight of the Nobles escaped from Richard: who meeting with Richmond in Britaine, fell forthwith into Counsell: where first it was determined that Earle Henry should take his oath to espouse the Lady Elizabeth eldest daughter unto King Edward, and the immediate heire to the Crowne, which he solemnely did in the Church at Rhedon: and they for their parts sweare unto him fealty, doing him homage with no lesse respect then unto their sole and crowned King.

Earle Henry returneth into Britaine.

(37) Of these proceedings King Richard soone heard, which indeed greatly appaled his thoughts, and all pensive and sad hee returned out of the West towards London, where to cut off the hopes of Richmonds further claime, he caused a Parliament to be assembled at Westminster, and therein attainted the said Earle Henry himselfe, and all such as had fled the Land in his behalfe, enacting them enemies to their naturall Countrey, their goods to be confiscated, and all their Lands and Possessions to be seized upon to the Kings use, which was so forwarded by his lewd Counsellors, and so executed by his fawning followers, that some better affected, set forth the present and oppressed estate in these scoffing rimes, to their further disgrace, divulging their names in manner as followeth;

The cat, the rat, and Lovell the dogge,

Alluding to the names of Ratcliffe the Kings mischievous Minion, and of Catesby his secret traducer, and to the Kings cognizance, which was the Boare: for which William Collingborne Esquier, who had beene Sheriffe of Wiltshire and Dorsetshire, was condemned, and upon the Tower-hill executed with all extremitie.

A subtile traine laid for the Earle.

(38) King Richards state standing in dangers abroad, and not altogether free from conspiracies at home, hee thought it best policy to enter amitie with Scotland, which he did for the terme of three yeares, and the more firme to assure himselfe of that King, hee intreated a marriage betwixt the Duke of Rothsay the Kings eldest sonne, and the Lady de'la Pole, daughter to Iohn Duke of Suffolke, and to the Dutchesse Elizabeth King Richards owne sister, whom he so much favoured, as that after the death of his owne sonne, he proclaimed Iohn Earle of Lincolne, her sonne and his Nephew, heire apparant to the Crowne of England, disinheriting King Edwards daughters, whose Brothers he had before murdered.

Offices made in the Duke of Britaine.

(39) His feares nothing lessened, but rather daily increased, he attempted once more to stop the Currant which led to the spring, to which end he sent his Ambassadours loaden with Gold, and many gay promises unto Francis Duke of Britaine, offering to give him all Richmonds lands, and yearely revenues if he would either send the said Earle into England, or commit him there unto prison. These comming to the the Dukes court, could have no communication with him, he lying extreamely sicke, and his wits too weak to entertaine discourse. Whereupon Peter Landois his Treasurer, a man pregnant in wit, and of great authority, tooke the motion in hand, unto whom the English Ambassadors promised all the Earles Revenewes if hee could bring King Richards request to passe. Hee greedy of gaine, and being in place to doe what he vvould, promised to effect it, conditionally that King Richard would make good his offer. Thus vvhilest messengers posted betvvixt Peter and Richard, Iohn Bishop of Ely being then in Flaunders, vvas certified by Christopher Vrswicke of all the circumstances of this purpose, vvhereupon the Bishop vvith all possible hast, sent the same intelligence the same day, and by the same man, unto Earle Henry in Britaine, vvilling him to shift himselfe and followvers, into France: vvho forthvvith sent Vrswicke unto King Charles, to have his license that he might vvith his good liking come into his dominions, vvhich being obtained he caused the other Lords, under pretence to visit the sicke Duke, to escape into Anjou, and vvo daies after changing his Apparell vvith his servant, vvaited upon him as upon his Master, and posted thence into France: vvhose escape vvhen the Treasurer heard of, he sent after to apprehend him, and that in such hast as at his entrance into the French dominions they vvere hard at his heeles.

(40) This sudd aine flight of the Earle and of the other English Lords, the Duke of Britaine (being somewhat recovered of his dangerous sicknesse) tooke very grievously, imputing it a great dishonour unto himselfe, to suffer the least suspect of breach betwixt him and the Earle, and therefore fore offended at Landose whom he suspected to be deepe in the deed, he sent for Edward Woodvile and Edward Pownings, two English Esquires, unto whom he delivered a sum of money which he had promised to Earle Henry, with a convoy unto all the rest of the English, to depart Vannes, bearing all their charges till they came to their Earle in France. Neither was King Charles backward to forward Earle Richmond against the Tyrant and Vsurper of the English Crowne. And the more to joy Henry, Iohn Earle of Oxford, imprisoned by King Edward the fourth in the Castle of Hammes; with Captaine Blunt his Keeper, and Sir Iohn Fortescue Porter of Calis, came unto Earle Henry to take their fortunes in following of his. This Earle of Oxford, as we have seene, was a continuall ayder of King Henry the sixt, against his opposite King Edward, and had done many services in the Lancastrians cause, till destiny had cast downe the hopes of their side. Him therefore Earle Henry made his chiefe Counsellor for warre, as for experience, policy, valour, and faith in that businesse, no man was more meete. Whose prowesse further appeared when Earle Henry won the wreath at Bosworth-field, where, in the Front of that Battell, he lead the band of Archers, and ever after lived in great favour with this King Henry the seventh, and in great honour dyed the fourth yeare of King Henry the eight. In the like trust for Counsell and favour with these Kings, was Richard Foxe Doctor of Divinitie, who being then a student in Paris, was found by Earle Richmond to be the chiefest man for imployment in his French businesse, which he so prudently and faithfully effected, as the Earle being King, acknowledging him one of his principall advancers, made him of his Privie-Councell, Lord Privie-Seale, and raised him to very great places in Church and Common-wealth, and lastly to testifie in what deare esteeme he held him, made him God-father to his sonne Prince Henrie, who was after King of England, with whom in great reverence he lived a long time, even till his eye-sight fayled through age, and did many workes of pietie, whereof Corpus Christi Colledge in Oxford, is and shall be for ever a noble witnesse; and his honourable care of reverend antiquitie, in preserving the bones of many Saxon Kings, and by him bestowed in faire Monuments in the Cathedrall Church of Winchester, shall never want due celebration amongst all that honour antiquitie and glorious studies. But from these worthy Subjects, we returne againe to the Soveraigne King Henry.

King Richard refraineth his Queenes bed.

(41) Whose beginnings thus forwarded by the Duke of Britaine and the French King, drew many English into France, and filled the heart of the Vsurper with an extreame feare; therefore to accomplish by pollicy, what was doubtfull by Armes, he fought to baite his hooke yet another way. The title he knew stood with the daughters of King Edward (his sonnes being murdered) and among them to Lady Elizabeth the eldest, whose marriage he well saw must bring Henry the Crowne. But that once diverted, his streame of it selfe could beare no great float, nor bring any inundation into the Land, and therefore Queene Elizabeth in Sanctuary must bee Courted, that her daughters might come to Court, and there be regarded according to their degrees. This so cunningly was carryed, by men that could carry themselves to fit womens affections, that the King was purged of the murther of her sonnes; she made to beleeve that her selfe was respected a Dowager Queene, and sister in law to the present King; and that himselfe had a Prince and many Princely Peeres most fit matches for those Princes her Daughters; that her sonne Thomas Marquesse Dorset, whilest he followed the runnaway Henry, left his honorable preferments intended to him-ward; and lastly, requiring a reconciliation with the Queene, forgave all injuries uttered against him out of her womanish passions, with a most willing heart: and indeed these messengers were such Crafts-masters, as they brought Queene Elizabeth into a fooles-Paradise, and made her beleeve that their words were his heart. Whereupon forgetting all things passed before, as the murther of her sonnes, the dishonour of her husband, the bastardy of their Children, and her owne scandall for Sorcery: nor remembring the faithfull promise she made to Lady Margaret Earle Henries mother, she delivered her five Daughters, as Lambes committed to the ravening Wolfe, in which act of hers is seene the weakenesse of that Sexe, and the ambition whereunto by nature they are inclined; for presently upon the delivery of her Daughters, she sent privily for the Lord Marquesse Dorset her sonne, then residing in Paris, willing him to desist from the Earles Faction, and come unto King Richard, who promised him preferment, and that her selfe and Daughters were in high favour, all injuries on both parts forgiven and forgotten.

(42) This entrance made unto the Tragedy intended, to furnish the Stage and finish the Scene of her owne life, the next Actor must be Queene Anne, who onely now stood in the Tyrants way, her death he meant should give life to his intended Regency, and adde a further Claime and strength to the possession which he already had, by matching with his Neece, the next heire unto the Crowne, the Lady Elizabeth; the let onely resting that himselfe had a Wife, her death therefore must immediately be sought, yet so as the honourable repure of his name should no wayes be impeached, ever carrying himselfe in outward semblance for a good religious honest man, and much desirous that his people should account him so. First therefore he began to lament the barrennesse of his wives wombe, and the great dangers that the Realme was like to sustaine, if himselfe should dye Issueless, complaining often thereof unto his Nobilitie, but most especially unto * Archbishop Rotheram lately released out of prison, whereby the Prelate conjectured Queene Anne had not long to live. Then refrained he her bed, under pretext of Penancy, taking her defect as a scourge for his owne sinnes, which day and night he sought to expiate by prayers: His next pollicy was, how her death might be wrought with the least suspect of wrong, and how taken when she was gone: Therefore as an assay to the Peoples taste, he caused it to be given forth that Queene Anne was dead, which was so commonly divulged, that the rumour thereof came to her owne eare, and shee having had sufficient experience of her Husbands proceedings, feared this to be one of his plots, mistrusting(and not without cause)that her life was in danger, whereupon all dismaid, with a lamentable countenance, she came to the King, and with weeping teares demanded, what offence shee had done, that the sentence of death was given against her already? Richard made it strange to see her so perplext, and with loving words, and smiling semblance, bade her live to scandalize report, and to thinke that many yeares were yet added to her life, but whether in conceit for sorrow, or of poyson, I cannot say, she died shortly after, and was solemnely buried in the Abbey of Westminster.

Her death and burial place.

(43) The King thus delivered from the bands of matrimony, and now a widower, at liberty to choose where he would, cast glances of love towards the Lady Elizabeth his owne brothers daughter, and began to court her for his second Queene, but the thing was so offensive to the law of nature, and so directly against the Law of God, as all men abhorred the motion, and most of all the Maiden her selfe, which Richard perceiving, he forbare over earnest pursuite, to gaine his time and to fit occasions; but most especially, having no leasure to woo, his Subjects on all sides daily revolting, and his Nobles more and more had in suspect; among whom one was Lord Thomas Stanley Earle of Darby, who had married Lady Margaret Countesse of Richmond, Earle Henries owne Mother: him therefore he most mistrusted, and before he would admit his departure from Court, commanded him to leave his sonne and heire George Stanley, the Lord Strange, for his hostage, which he did, though it little availed to binde Darbies affection unto his side.

King Richard courteth Lady Elizabeth.

Levit. 18. 14.

Thomas Earle of Darby much suspected of the King.

George, Lord Strange, delivered in pledge to King Richard.

(44) In this while King Richard hearing that Oxford had escaped out of the Castle of Hammes, and that he, with the Captaine thereof James Blunt, were fled into France, and joyned with Richmond; thought it high time to quench the sparkes in those parts, before they should rise to a higher flame; and therefore he appointed (which was prefently accomplished) the Garrison at Calis to strait the said Castle with a hard siege, being well assured that many well-willers to the Earles proceedings lay there harboured, who upon the least advantage would be ready to play. But Henry not unmindfull of his distressed friends, nor Oxford forgetting his kinde Hostesse Captaine Blunts wife, made unto the Peece, and on the sudden put Thomas Brandon, with thirtie approved Souldiers into the Castle, who from the walles played upon the besiegers, whiles Oxford annoyed them upon their backes, so that presently they offered, and came to a composition; which was, that they within should safely depart, but the Castle to remaine in subjection to the King.

Hammes besieged by the Garrison of Calis.

(45) Hammes thus restored, in danger to be lost, and nothing had thence besides a woman and a few suspected persons, King Richard thought himselfe now sure of all, and fearing no invasion at home, imagined that much harme could not be done abroad: for Henry in France (as he thought) found very few friends, and was fully perswaded that the French Kings assistance stood more of words then in deeds. And indeed some occasion of such suspition was ministred; for King Charles but young, and the Princes at variance, Earle Henry was enforced to make suite unto them man by man. Besides, Thomas Marquesse Dorset, sent for by his Mother the Queene, suddenly in the night made an escape from Paris, with purpose for England, which stroke great feare among Earle Henries part, chiefly for that all their Counsels were knowne unto the Marquesse, which if he should reveale, their designes were made desperate. To prevent which, he vvas posted after, and brought backe againe, though much against his will. These things considered, King Richard, to lessen his great charges, discharged his Navy at Seas, commanding the Welsh to watch the shoare, Beacons to be built, and armour to be ready at every call; then giving his affections leave to entertaine more securitie, saw not the sword that hung over his head.

King Richard dischargeth his Navy.

Henry solliciteth the French, man by meanes.

Marquesse Dorset seeketh to escape from Henry.

(46) But Earle Henry delivered from the feare of the Marquesse, thought it not best to prolong time, lest others upon like purposes should bewray his intents; and thereupon obtaining a small ayde of the French, with a certaine summe of money, for which the Lord Marquesse (whom he much mistrusted) and Sir John Bourchier were left in pledge, he set forward to Roan, and prepared his shipping in the mouth of Seyn: whither tidings was brought him of Queene Annes death, and that King Richard purposed to marry Lady Elizabeth: a feare indeed farre exceeding the former, shee being the Princesse by whom he must claime, whereupon much distemperature arose, every mans braine working upon the newes. But after much consultation, it was held the best to make over into England, to interpose the proceedings ere the match was fully made, whereupon Earle Richmond with two thousand men onely, and a small number of ships, set sayle from Harfleut the fifteenth of August, and the seventh day following arrived at Milford-Haven in Wales, where taking Land he came unto Dale, and thence the next day marched to Hereford west, ten miles into the Maine, from thence he marched to Cardigan, where he had newes that the Countrey was fore-laid against him, but finding that untrue, he made still forward, beating downe such Houlds as held against him: then sending secretly to Lady Margaret his Mother, to the Lord Stanley, Talbot, and others, signified unto them, he meant to passe Severne at Shrewesbury, and thence to march directly towards London. In his way to Shrewesbury, there met him Sir Rice ap Thomas, a man of great command in Wales, with a number of men to side in his quarrell, which Henry afterwards required in making this his first ayder the Governour of Wales.

Earle Henry setteth forward his journey.

Henry sent word of his vaage to his Mother, and others.

(47) The Earle more boldly from Shrewesbury, held on his march to the Towne of Newport, whither Sir Gilbert Talbot, with two thousand strong, from the young Earle of Shrewesbury, gave him his ayde. Then passed he forward to Stafford, and had conference there with Sir William Stanley; and proceeding forward, was honourably received into the Citie Lichfield, where Thomas Earle of Darby, with five thousand armed men, had beene some few dayes before, but hearing of Earle Henries approach, removed to Anderson, to avoid suspition of the jealous King than kept his sonne Hostage for his further truth.

Sir Gilbert Talbot joyneth with Earle Henry.

Henry commeth to Lichfield.

(48) King Richard at this time held his Court at Nottingham, where being informed that Earle Henry with a small Company was landed in Wales, made small account of what he could doe, altogether relying upon the Lord Walter Herbert, and Sir Rice ap Thomas, two principall men, in whom he conceived no little truth: yet lest this new-risen spring might gather in more heads, he sent to John Duke of Norfolke, Henry Earle of Northumberland, and Thomas Earle of Surrey, willing them with a selected power to represse the insolency of this head-strong Earle: Moreover, he sent for Sir Robert Brakenbury Lieutenant of the Tower, Sir Thomas Bourchier, and Sir Walter Hungerford, Knights, all of them in great jealousie and mistruth; commanding them with their forces to come and attend upon his person, which accordingly they set forward to doe, meane while sending his Spials to know the way Henry went, had intelligence that hee was past Shrewesbury without any impeachment; whereat storming in choller, and cursing their untruthes whom he had put in trust, craved vengeance from Heaven, and instantly instantly intended to revenge it himselfe; then having notice the Earle was at Lichfield, and his party increased by daily repaire, incontinently hee marshalled his followers; and like a valiant Captaine and politicke leader set forward his Battailes five and five in a rancke. In the middest of his troopes he bestowed the Carriages belonging to his Army: and himselfe mounted upon a white Courser, invironed with his Guard, followed by his footmen, and the wings of Horsemen ranged on every side, with a frowning sterne countenance, but yet in great Pompe, entred the Towne of Leicester after the Sun was set, being full of indignation and swelling in anger, which somewhat he asswaged with threats of revenge.

King Richard forward to meet his enemy.

King Richard commeth to Leicester.

(49) Earle Richmond from Leichfield departed for Tamworth, and in the way met Sir Thomas Bourchier, and Sir Walter Hungerford going towards the King, who upon this unlooked for occasion, and knowing themselves in what suspition they stood, secretly left the company of their Captaine Brakenbury the night following, and wandring in waies unknown, with much adoe got safely unto the Earles Companies.

Sir Thomas and Sir walter Hungerford, turne to Earle Henry.

(50) In the like danger through darkenesse of night, Henry himselfe chanced to come, for albeit he was a man both valiant and forward, and by his own wisedome could manage his waightiest affaires; Yet now having notice that King Richard with a strong army was neere, and that his Father in law, the Lord Stanley stood as a Neuter, he was strucke deepe in his dumps, and with twenty light Horse-men lingering behind, so seriously musing what was to be done, as lastly, he lost the sight of his Hoast, and by the darkenesse of night missed his way; neither durst hee for the Kings Scout-watch demand direction to Tamworth, but lay in a small Village about three miles distant, to his no little griefe, and his whole Armies great amazement, the one prognosticating it to bee a presage of an ill beginning, and the other doubting some determent of their Lord, but in the dawning of the next morning (conducted by good fortune) hee came to his Hoast, excusing that his absence was to have conference with his secret friends; and then privily departing to the Lord Stanley, had conference with him, and was put in good comfort.

Earle Henry of Richmond ariveth at Milford-Haven.

Henries excuse.

(51) But contrariwife, King Richard was wrapped and perplexed with feare, not onely with the departure of Sir John Savage, Sir Brian Sanford, and Sir Simond Digby, in whom he had reposed great trust, but also in the dreadfull dreames which nightly he suffered, wherein to his seeming, terrible Divels so pulled and haled him, as by no meanes hee could take any rest, which fearefull imaginations strucke so deepe an impression unto his heart, that the signes thereof appeared in his countenance, howsoever hee sought to put them off in shew.

King Richard terrified with dreadfull dreames.

(52) But being determined to put himselfe to the triall of battell, or else, (and that rather) enforced by divine Iustice to pull the revenging hand of heaven against him, in the morning he marched toward the enemy, and upon a faire plaine called Redmore, neere unto Bosworth, about seven miles west from Leicester, he pitched downe his Tents, and thence sent a Pursevant to the Lord Stanley, commanding him to advance forward with his company, and to come to his presence, which if hee refused to doe, hee sware by Christs passion, his sonnes head should off before that hee dyned. The Lord Stanley answered the Pursevant, that if the King did so, hee had more sonnes alive; but to come to the King hee was not at that time determined. This answer declared, King Richard commanded the Lord Strange incontinent to bee beheaded, at the very season, when the two Armies came in sight each of others, but his Counsellors tolde him, that the time was now to fight, and not to execute, which might better be done when the field was fought: whereupon the Lord Strange was delivered prisoner to the keepers of the Kings Tents, and the Kings holy vow thus broke, the Lord Strange escaped with life, by this bad tyrants too good a death.

Lord Stanleys answer unto the Kings message.

The Lord Strange commanded to be beheaded.

(53) But now the time and houre of Battell being come, hee drew out his Army upon the plaine, whose order for fight he thus placed: The foreward he ordered of a marvellous length, to strike the more terror in the beholders hearts, in whose forefront he placed his Archers, as a Bulwarke to defend the rest, the leading whereof was committed to John Duke of Norfolke, with whom was Thomas Earle of Surrey, his sonne, his owne Battallion was furnished with his best approoved men of warre, having Horsemen for wings on both sides of his battell: and being thus ordered for their further incouragement King Richard mounted in place to bee heard, thus said to his Souldiers.

The order of King Richards battell.

King Richards Oration unto his Souldiers.

King Richard confesseth his fault.

"how to govern a field? What are his followers, but "a sort of fainting runnagates, whose fearefull eyes, "as they could not behold our rayes in peace, can "worse abide to see our royall banner displaied a- "gainst them in fight? for their owne consciences "shall bewray their guilt; their oathes, their perjury; "their promise, infidelitie; and the sight of us their "anointed Soveraign shall either cause the shameful- "ly to flie, or submissively to yeeld themselves to our "mercy. As touching his French and Britaine aiders, "their valours have been well knowne to our Noble "Progenitors, often vanquished, but never vanquish- "ers, onely braggers without any great deeds, "drunkards without discretion, Ribaulds without "reason, Cowards without resistance, and (in a "word) effeminate, lascivious, and never seene in "the Front of a Battell, seeking ten times more "meanes to flie and escape, then once to assault the "face of their enemies. Therefore like valiant Cap- "taines advance forth your Standards, and make "knowne your manhood by dint of Sword, and be "yee sure, that if every one of you give but one sure "stroke, the day will be ours; for how can a handfull "withstand a whole Realme? Advance therefore "forward, my Captaines; in whom I well know is "wanting neither courage, pollicy, wisedome, nor "puissance. I therefore desire you, for your love "to me-ward, the zeale of your native Countrey, "and the safetie of your Prince and selves, to shew "this day your true English valour, and for my selfe, "I assure you, I will this day either triumph in a glo- "rious victory, or die in this quarrell with immor- "tall Fame; in whose Palace all our names shall be "enrolled, if we preferre the renowne of our Coun- "trey before our owne lives. Now S. George for us, "and us for victory; hast therefore forward, and re- "member this, that I am he who with high advance- "ment will preferre the valiant and hardy, and with "severe torture will punish the dastard and cowardly "Runnaway. The Oration ended, as it gave courage to some, so gave it distaste unto others, whose hearts carried gall, though their mouthes dropped honey; some intended to turne to Earle Henry; some determined to take part with the strongest; and some meant to stand still and doe nothing; so unsure was he of his Subjects loyaltie, that had beene so traiterous to his owne Nephewes.

The divers opinions of King Richards hoast.

(55) Earle Richmond then seeing King Richard thus embattelled, sent to the Lord Stanley, who stood hovering aloofe off, to come helpe him to order his fight, whose answer was, that Henry should doe it himselfe, and that he would come to him when he saw time convenient, which strucke the Earle into a great dumpe; but now having no time for delay, necessitie compelled him to order his men. The Forewarde he made single, according to his small number of souldiers, and in the Front placed his Archers, over whom John Earle of Oxford was Captaine, the right wing was led by Sir Gilbert Talbot; and the left assigned to Sir John Savage: Earle Henry himselfe with his Vncle Jasper Earle of Pembrooke governed the Maine Battell, better replenished with horse then foot, whose whole number consisted hardly of five thousand, the Kings doubling the number, and more. The Battels thus ordered, Earle Henry armed at all peeces saving his Helmet, rode from ranke to ranke, and from wing to wing, incouraging his men, and the more to encrease their hot spirits, mounted upon a little banke, the better to be seene and heard, these words he uttered in all their hearing.

"(56) If ever God gave victory to a just quar- "rell, if ever he aided warre for the tuition of a King- "dome or Countrey, or ever succoured them that "fought for the reliefe of poore innocents, oppres- "sed by tyranny, then no doubt my friends and fel- "low Souldiers, but that this day he will give us a "triumphant victory. For if we consider for what, "and against whom we fight, we may not doubt but "that God himselfe will fight for us. The thing "which we are here ready to try by Sword, is the li- "bertie of the Land from under the usurpation and "yoake of a Tyrant, and he, against whom wee "draw sword, is the Monster (for I may not call him "man) which feareth neither God, Lawes, Iustice, "nor Humanitie, an homicide, a murderer of his "own kindred, a destroyer of the Nobilitie, a Mawle "to his Subjects, and a firebrand to the whole King- "dome, whom just vengeance craveth to have quen- "ched: and consider I pray you, who be of his band, "even such as by murder and untruth to their kinne "and Countrey, have got wrongfull possession of "our rightfull inheritance, letting your wives weepe, "and Orphanes wander, to seeke their livelihood "where they can get it, whose teares I doubt not "cry in the eares of the Lord, who will punish these "Malefactors either with pricke of conscience cow- "ardly to flye, or deliver themselves into our hands "without Battell. Consider further, I pray you, "that in yonder great Battell are men brought more "for feare then for love, by force compelled and not "willingly assembled; persons that desire more the "destruction, then the life of their Captaine, and fi- "nally a multitude, whereof the most part bee our "friends, and the least part his that leades them; and "surely it stands in suspence, whether the malice of "the Souldiers towards their Generall, or his feare "conceived against them, be the greater; for this is a "rule infallible, that as ill-men daily covet to destroy "the good, so God appointeth the good men to con- "found the ill, and if it be true that Clerkes preach "that the one is to be hated, and the other beloved, "who then can spare yonder tyrant Richard Duke of "Glouceſter untruely calling himselfe King, that hath "broken both the Lawes of God and Man, in the "bloud of his brother, the murther of his Nephews, "the death of his Wife, the slander of his owne Mo- "ther, and the bastardizing of his brethren? If you "have not heard, yet I have read that Tarquin the "proud, for the rape of Lucretia, lost the Kingdome "of Rame: yet was not his fact so detestable as Ne- "roes, who slew his owne Mother, to behold the "place of his conception: but yonder usurper is "both these persons in one; a Nero in murther of his "young Nephewes, and in defaming the wombe of "his owne conception: and a Tarquine, intending to "desile, and carnally to know his owne Neece, under "pretext of holy Matrimony, which Lady you are "witnesse I have sworne shall be my wife. This is the "quarrell for which we are here this day assembled, "and for whose equitie we crave God to be judge: "a good beginning of his Protection we have alrea- "dy seene, in escaping the treasons laid for us in Bri- "taine, the dangers of Seas, and our safe arrivage unto "this place, not hunted by any, but rather our selves "hunting after that furious Bore; who this day, and "in this place, is so intangled in his owne toyle, as his "crooked tuskes shall not be able to gnaw the cords "of his snare asunder, nor himselfe have power to "free himselfe from his pursuers, whose lavelines (I "doubt not) shall be dyed in the bloud of this filthy "Swine, & shall well rid the world of an ugly hog'd- "backed Monster: which thing to accomplish let us "remember, that victory is not gotten by multitude, "but by manhood, but the smaller number we be, "the greater is our glory if we vanquish, if vanquish- "ed, fretting time shall never consume our memo- "ry, that died to free our selves, and Nation from "the oppression of an usurping Tyrant; and thus I "assure you, that for so just a cause you shall finde "me this day rather a dead Carrion upon the cold "ground, then a Carpet-prisoner kept alive for re- "proch. Advance therfore forward like true-hearted "Englishmen, display your Banner in defence of your "Countrey, get the day and be Conquerours, loose "the Battell and be villaines; God and Saint George "give us a happy successe. Which no sooner was said but that the Souldiers buckled their Helmes, the Archers stript up their sleeves, bent their bowes and frushed frushed their feathers, attentively listening when the Trumpet should give the sound of Battell.

The purpole of Earle Henry.

(57) Betwixt both the Armies there lay a great marish, which Earle Henry left upon his right hand, with purpose to have that for a defence, as also the Sunne at his backe, and face of the enemy, which King Richard perceiving, with sound of Trumpet, and shout of his Army, passed the Marish, when the Bow-men on both sides let freely flye their arrowes: the rest comming to encounter with strokes: but the Earle of Oxford fearing to bee encompassed by the enemy, commanded every of his rankes to keepe within ten foote of his Standard, which being accomplished, and their fight a while stayed, their opposites mistrusting some fraud or deceit, ceased likewise from theirs, many of them willing enough so to doe; notwithstanding, immediately a cruell battell was againe begun, and manfully continued upon either part. Till lastly, King Richard having intelligence that the Earle of Richmond was but slenderly accompanied with men of Armes, and them also busied in their owne guardes, meant by his incounter to finish the day, as the onely man upon whom stood all the hope of his enemies successe; and therefore having the markes of Earle Henry, made from the range of his owne battell, and upon the spurre with the Speare in his Rest, ranne violently towards him in a furious spleene; in which rage, at the first brunt, he bare-downe and overthrew the Earles Standard, and slew Sir William Brandon the bearer thereof; next, matching with Sir John Cheiney a man of great might, manfully threw him to the ground, thereby making an open passage by dint of sword unto the Earle himselfe; Richmond beholding the high valour of Richard, most Lyon-like coped with this cruell Bore, and held him (maugre his tuskes) at his sword point, betwixt whom the fight was so desperate, that Henries company were strucke in great despaire; at which very instant Sir William Stanley came in with three thousand tall fresh Souldiers, who entred the battell with such courage and valour, as they bare downe all before them where they went, whereat the Kings side began to faint, and to give over fight, but the more resolute a while maintaining their ground, and now mistrusting treason among themselves, turned their backes and ran away, whereby King Richard presently perceived the downefall of his ill raised glory, and the full period of his short raigne: and all hope of resistance now past, a swift horse was brought to escape the field, with comforts that another day might fet the victory on his side: but with a mind unmatchable in hatred against Henry, or rather to have his death registred in fames honourable role, whose life had beene blotted with the pen of divulged infamy, he hastily closed his Helmet, saying, that, that day should make an end of all battels, or else in this now in trying, he would finish his life, which last was presently performed; for thrusting into the middest of his enemies, and there valiantly fighting among the thickest, he obtained more honour in this his two houres fight, then he had gained by all the actions of his whole life.

(59) The slaine body of the usurping Tyrant, all tugged, and torne, naked, and not so much as a clout left to cover his shame, was trussed behind Blanch Seint-Leger (or White-Bore, a Pursevant at Armes,) like a Hogge or Calfe, his head and armes hanging on the one side of the horse, and his legges on the other, and all be-sprinkled with mire and bloud, was so brought into Leiceſter, and there for a miserable spectacle the space of two dayes lay naked and unburied his remembrance being as odious to all, as his person, deformed, and lothfome to be looked upon: for whose further despite, the white Bore his cognizance was torne downe from every Signe, that his monument might perish, as did the monyes of Caligula, which were all melted by the decree of the Senate: Lastly, his body without all funerall solemnity was buried in the Gray-Fryers Church of that City. But King Henry his successor, of a princely disposition, caused afterward his Tombe to be made with a picture of Ablaster, representing his person, and to be set up in the same Church; which at the suppression of that Monastery was pulled downe, and utterly defaced; since when his grave over-growne with Nettles and weeds, is very obscure, and not to be found. Onely the stone cheſt wherein his corps lay, is now made a drinking trough for Horses at a common Inne, and retaineth the onely memory of this Monarchs greatnesse. But his body (as tradition hath delivered) was borne out of the City, and contemptuously bestowed under the end of Bow-Bridge, which giveth passage over a branch of Soware upon the West side of the Towne. Vpon this Bridge (the like report runneth) stood a stone of some height, against which King Richard, as he passed toward Bosworth, by chance strucke his spur, and against the same stone as he was brought backe, hanging by the horse side, his head was dashed and broken, as a wife-woman (forsooth) had foretold, who, before Richards going to battell, being asked of his successe, said, that where his spurre strucke, his head should bee broken; but of these things, as is the report, so let bee the credire. Dead hee is, and with his death ended the factions a long time continued betwixt the Families of Lancaſter and Yorke; in whose bandings, to bring, set, and keepe, the Crowne on their heads, eight or nine bloudy set battels had beene fought, and no lesse then foure score persons of the bloud-royall slaine, as Philip Comines the French Writer saith; many of them being well knowne to himselfe: after which stormes, and this Tyrants death, a blessed union ensued, by joyning those houses in Henry of Lancaſter, and Elizabeth of Yorke.

Henry VII.

HENRIE THE SEAVENTH KING OF ENGLAND AND FRANCE, AND LORD OF IRELAND, THE FIFTIE-SEAVENTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISH, HIS RAIGNE, ACTS, AND ISSVE.

Monarch 57.

CHAPTER XX.

An. Dom. 1485. 22. Aug. The date of his raignes commencement.

HENRIE of that name the seaventh, having by such mixt meanes of valor and practise as are already described, obtained the possession of Englands Crowne, wee must now present unto you his actions in the person and state of a King, maintained by him with like mixture of courage and skill as it was archieved, to the verification of that rule; That things are kept by the same Arts whereby they were gained. In describing whereof, we meane nothing leffe, then for humoring the vaine admirers of phraise and conceit, to mount up into Panegyrical flourishes, in honour of the man, though his excellent vertues would worthily beare, if not duely also exact them: yet may we not omit to observe, that as in his attaining to the Crowne, there was (through divine providence) a concurring disposition of all important circumstances, without which his attempt might have proved disastrous; so he, having now possessed the Soveraigne power, and mastered the State in the maine points, easily made circumstances waite upon his wisedome, and to take their forme from his directions: Of the first kinde, wherein his felicity deserves to be celebrated, were these. That hee by the Male-line a meere stranger to both the royall houses, as descended from the Welsh and French, and by the female springing out of such a Family, of Lancaster (the Beaufords) as by the same law which enabled it to inherite in ordinary estates, was made incapable of succession in the Regalitie, should so safely be conveyed away into forraigne parts, there to continue an head of expectation and revolt; during ring the inteſtine troubles and dangers, to him inevitable here at home. Secondly, that the Realme of Englaad ſhould be ſo averted from Richard, (though a very honorable, wiſe, juſt and neceſſary Prince, after hee was ſomewhat ſetled) as for his ſake, to neglect (in a ſort) ſo many naturall heires of the houſe of Yorke, ſome of them in right preceding Richard; ſuch were the children of Edward the fourth, and George Duke of Clarence, Richards elder Brethren, and all of them juſt barres to the Earle of Richmond, who ſcarce had any thing of a legall title, or of a warrantable intention; but his purpoſe to remove an Vſurper, and marry the Lady Elizabeth, the rightfull inheritrice. Thirdly, a long and fatall * ſlackeneſſe of Richard in his warlike preparations. through the meere contempt of his enemie the Earle, which was the cauſe, that both hee landed ſecurely, and Richard was driven to fight in a manner with tumultuary, rather then trained forces. And finally, that a principall, potent, noble, and yet a deepely ſuſpected Conſpirator, (as being Father in law to the Earle) ſhould have charge, under Richard, ouer a chiefe partion of his Army, at the very inſtant of joyning battell.

* Fabian: faith, Richard leaving little, provided little defence.

(2) Theſe conſiderations (among many other) had in them ſuch an aptitude to his deſigne, as no humane wit could faſhion, and without the which a man of equall ſtarres and parts to Henry, or Henry himſelfe, might in vaine have beene wiſe, in vaine induſtrious and valiant. Circumſtances of the other ſort ſhall plentifully occurre in the whole carriage of his enſuing actions. In both which, are veriſied two contrary rules; for the ſtate of the firſt obſervations teacheth us with Plautus, that Centum doctorum hominum conſilia hec una vincit Dea; This one Goddeſſe can effect more, then the wits of an hundred learned men; ſpeaking, as an Heathen man, of that famous Idoll Fortune; and in the ſecond, that which Iuvenall excellently noteth;

The deſcription of King Henries minde and qualities.

(3) Now for the Character of this famous wiſe Prince (which with reaſon ought to be ſet in front to his actions, as certaine lights of the mind, by which to diſcerne the fountaine of Counſels and Cauſes) a * learned, eloquent Knight, and principall Lawyer of our time, gives us many things, of which theſe ſelected, are very regardable. "This King (ſaith he) attained unto the Crowne, not onely from a private fortune, which might endue him with a moderation, but alſo from the fortune of an exiled man, which had quickned in him all the ſeeds of obſervation and induſtry. His wiſedome (ſpeaking thereof as it was in his raigne) ſeemed rather a dexterity to deliver himſelfe from dangers, wheathey preſſed him, then any deepe fore-ſight to prevent them a farre off. Jealous he was over the Greatneſſe of his Nobility, as remembring how himſelfe was ſet up. Great and devout reverence hee bare unto Religion, as hee that imployed Eccleſiaſticall men in moſt of his affaires. In his government hee was led by none, ſcarcely by his Lawes, and yet he was a great obſerver of formality in all his proceedings, which notwithſtanding was no impediment to the working of his will. In his warres (meaning domeſticke) he was rather confident then enterprizing, by which alſo he was commonly not the poorer. Generally, he ſeemed inclinable to live in peace, and in the quenching of the Commotions of his ſubjects hee was ever ready to atchive thoſe warres in perſon, ſometime reſerving himſelfe, but never retyring himſelfe. Of nature he coveted to accumulate treaſure: in expending whereof hee never ſpared charge that his affaires required, and in his foundations was magnificent enough. Hee choſe commonly to imploy cunning perſons, as hee that knew himſelfe ſufficiently to make uſe of their uttermoſt reaches, without danger of being abuſed with them himſelfe.

* Tob. Roſ. of Henr. M.S.

(4) * Another having a purpoſe to write in Engliſh the Hiſtory of this Henry (an Argument which for the worthy doing thereof, requires as wiſe a man as Henry himſelfe) hath among many extraordinary prayſes (moſt-what framed out of his ſtrong affection) truely noted concerning his atchievement of the Crowne: "That the Almighty hand of God brought him over the top of the higheſt and moſt dangerous obſtacles, to ſway this Scepter, when neither Title, Power, nor (great) probability could give him ſo much as one ſound puſh to ſet him forward. And of the man himſelfe, That he entertained that, as ſodaine, as Soveraigne change of fortune, with ſuch moderation, and un-tranſported diſcretion, as it well appeared hee had throughly conquered himſelfe, before hee ſubdued the Vſurper his enemie. What could be added greater to ſo true a praiſe? nothing certainely: for that he (as elſe-where that Writer ſaith) was the Salomon, who brought peace to this Kingdome, long before oppreſſed by warre and tyranny: it was onely an excellent effect of that excellent moderation. Other Authors of our times concurre in the ſame judgment of him, whom they praiſe * *for ſingular wiſedome, excellent temperance, and moderate frugality; for * policy, juſtice, and gravitie*: which princely vertues cauſed him to be highly reverenced of forraine Princes. Theſe honorable Eulogies, after ſo many yeares from his death, juſtly countenance their relations, who * writing, in or about his owne dayes averre no leſſe; among whom, Bernard Andreas of Thoulouſe is moſt flowing and abundant. This Andreas (as himſelfe writes) was afterward entruſted with the inſtruction of Prince Arthur (eldeſt ſonne to King Henry) in good letters, though he was blinde; and having aſwell the title of Poet Laureat, as of the Kings Hiſtoriographer, (how hardly ſoever thoſe two faculties meet with honour in the ſame perſon) meant to have hiſtorified and poetized the Acts of this King, but (for want of competent and attended inſtructions in many places of good importance) left his labour full of wilde breaches, and unfiniſhed; yet in ſuch points as hee hath profeſſed to know, not unworthy to be vouched: for there is in him a great deale of cleare elocution, and defaecated conceit above the ordinary of that age. He, among other verſes in honour of this our Henry (whom he enſtyleth the moſt ſapient King) hath theſe, not hyperbolicall, but proper, wherein he ſalutes him.

The Mayor of London and his Fellowſhip, * received him in Violet at Harnſey Parke, but his entrance (which was at * Shore-ditch) was honoured with a very great troup of the Peeres, and Nobles in his Traine, at which our Poeticall Hiſtorian Andreas was preſent, and ſaluted the victorious Prince with certaine Latine Saphicks, which hee ſung unto him, as himſelfe writeth. But Henry ſtayed not in Ceremonious greetings and popular acclamations, which (it ſeemes) he did purpoſely eſchue, for that (Andreas ſaith) he entred * covertly, meaning belike, in an Horſe-litter or cloſe Chariot. (6) But the naturall ſolder and indiſſoluble cement, which muſt make this Kingdome ſtand, was his marriage with the Lady Elizabeth, eldeſt daughter of the late Edward the fourth. This as a point of moſt importance, was with great maturity and judgement againe thought upon, when Henry was now already crowned. The remoter danger, ſuppoſed to reſide in the perſon of Edward Earle of Warwicke (onely ſonne and heire, even in his infelicities, to that unfortunate Prince George Duke of Clarence) was prevented; for hee had beene, by King Henries direction, brought up priſoner from the Mannour of * Sherif-hutton in Yorkeſhire, (where aſwell he, as the Lady Elizabeth were kept by King Richard under guard) and immediately ſhut up within the Tower of London.

When therefore the newes of his death came to her ears, the joy of her heart brake forth into theſe words. * So, yet at the laſt thou haſt, O God, regarded the humble, and not deſpiſed their prayers. I well remember, neither ſhall I at any time be weary to remember that my moſt noble father, of famous memory, meant to have beſtowned me in marriage upon this moſt comely Prince. O that I were now worthy of him; but my Father being dead, I want ſuch good friends as ſhould motion ſo great a matter: and perhaps he will take a wife from forraine parts, whoſe beauty, age, fortune, and dignity ſhall be more then mine. What ſhall I ſay? I am all alone, and dare not open my minde to * any. What if I acquainted my mother therewith? Baſhfulneſſe forbids: What if ſome of the Lords? Audacity wanteth. What will he I know not: this I know, that Almighty God cannot tell how to abſent himſelfe from them who truſt in him. Therefore I make an end of thinking, and repoſe my whole hope upon thee, O my God, doe with mee, according to thy mercy. Shee ſecretly thus revolving all matters, and reſolving of them in her minde, was heard from above; for king Henry having underſtood the honour, chaſtity, and ſingular vertues of the maiden Princeſſe, the rather inclined to make her the Soveraigne of his affections: aſſigning therefore a day, wherein (for the utter abolishment of all Hoſtilities betweene the two Royall Houſes of Yorke and Lancaſter) to eſtabliſh an union of Families, by conjunction of their two perſons in marriage.

(12) Meane-while there were not a few who did envie to King Henry this unexpected height of felicitie; but they who first discovered themselves, were certaine remaines of the late overthrow at Bosworth, whose diffidence, or evill-will, was greater then to relie upon King Henries clemency, or to behold the dazeling brightnesse of his new atchieved glory; and for that cause refused to forsake the Sanctuary, which they had taken at Colchester. These were, the Lord Lovell, Sir Humfrey Stafford, and Thomas Stafford his brother. Who, while the King, secure of dangers behinde him, was in his Progresse at Yorke, meaning by affability, bounty, and other his wisest courses, to gaine the good wils of the Northern people, (with whom the memory of King Richard was very deare) and so to weaken the strengths and hopes of all future conspiracies, forsooke their refuge, and secretly in severall places gathered forces, therewith to surprize and dethrone the King. The Lord Lovell raised his forces with such speed, that the King, who at Lincolne first heard of his escape, and lightly regarded the same, was no sooner setled in Yorke, but certaine intelligence came that hee approached fast with an Army; and withall, that the Staffords had assembled forces in Worcestershire, meaning to assault the Citie of Worcester. The extremity of the King (who never dreamt of such a darling) was not small, for neither had he any sufficient numbers about him of his sure friends, nor could justly repose confidence in the Northern men, whose love to King Richard their late slaine Lord, made them still suspected. But danger quickeneth noble courages, and therefore upon due recollection of himselfe, he armes about three thousand men, (if tanned leather, whereof the most of their brest-pieces, for want of other stuffe, were framed, may be called armour) and sends them under the leading of Jasper Duke of Bedford, with commission to pardon, or to fight. The Duke offering pardon, the Lord Lovell fled by night to * Sir Thomas Broughton into Lancashire, where he lurked certaine moneths; the headlesse multitude yeeld without stroake, and the felicity of King Henry prevailes in every place; for the Staffords hearing what had happened to their Confederates, dispersе their Cloude of Rebels, and speedily take refuge at Colsham, a Village about two miles from Abingdon in Oxfordshire. But the priviledges of that place * being juridically scand in the Kings Bench, they were found unable to afford protection to open traitors, whereupon they were forceably taken thence, and conveyed to the Tower of London, from whence Sir Humfrey Stafford was drawne and executed at Tiburne, but his brother Thomas by the Kings mercy had his pardon. These short dangers and troubles, by reason of their suddainty did worthily make the King wakefull even over smaller accidents; this blaze being kindled from so neglected sparkles. But there followed devises, which in their owne nature were so strangely impudent, and in their vent so strongly bolstered, that if Lovels enterprize made him suspicious, these other might justly fill him with innumerable jealousies.

(13) The records are immortall, which testifie, that the erection of Idols and Counterfeits, to dethrone them who are in possession, is a very olde Stratagem. What troubles a Pseudo-Nero wrought, by support of the Parthians (who wonderfully favoured Nero living,) the Romane Writers teach us. Neither hath the Divell (Father of Impostures) any so folemne practise, as Personation and Resemblances of true, whether men or things. Insomuch that some Divines have thought, that as he can, and often doth transshape himselfe into the forme of a Celestiall Angell, so that he also deceived our first mother under that resplendent but assumed habite. And what mischiefs he wrought, in this very kind of thrusting out into the world false pretenders, the speech of wise* Gamaliel testifieth, who rehearseth the names of Theudas and Judas Galilæus; but the world hath since had more woefull experience hereof, in that execrable Impostor Mahomet, pretending to bee the Messiah. In England it selfe (before the time of this Henry) what strange practises and conspiracies were set on foote under the title of a Pseudo-Richard in the raigne of Henry the fourth, the former Histories have sufficiently opened, so that this Prince encountred nothing new in the Generall, howsoever pestilent and extraordinary in the particular. Indeed his raigne (more perhaps then any other of his predecessors) afforded plentifull matter for such devises to worke upon, there being many then, who having beene * conceived (as it were) in the bowels of Sedition, and nourished with the bitter and pernicious milke of dissention, were not onely apt to embrace, but also, where they were not offered, even there to beget occasions of confounding all. *Men, * who could neither endure warre, nor peace long, nor any lawes in either, as desirous to enjoy the licentious violences of civill warre; a * misery, which all words (how wide soever) want compasse to expresse.* The strange attempts of which kinde of men (rather Monsters) we shall see exemplified in the subsequent tragedies. Richard Simon, an ambitious and impofterous wretch, and withall a Priest, neither unlearned, (the sacred shadow of which name the rather countenanced his practises) in hope to make himselfe the principall Bishop of England, plotted the advancement of Lambert Symnell (being his pupill in the Vniversity of Oxford) to the Crowne of England; instigated thereto by the divell and suborned by such as favoured the White-rose faction, upon this occasion. There went a rumour, that Edward Earle of Warwicke, sonne and heire to George the late unfortunate Duke of Clarence, second brother of King Edward, * was either already murthered, or should shortly be. This Architect of guile, Simon, having this Symnel in tuition, (the * sonne of a Baker, or Shoomaker, but a well-faced and Princely-shaped youth, of no * very evill nature, but as it was corrupted by his Tutor,) meanes, out of this rumors aery substance, to produce an apparition and prodigy, which in Title, behaviour, and artificiall answeres (infused by his Tutors practises) should resemble * one of King Edwards Children. Here we must confesse, that our Authors leade us into a perplexity: Some * affirming, that this counterfeit was exhibited to the world under the name of Edward Earle of Warwicke, sonne of the Duke of Clarence, by the daughter of the most turbulent and fatall Earle of Warwicke, slaine at Barnet-field. But hereunto reason seemes repugnant. For what ground of claime could that Gentleman have, not onely for that his Father was attainted, but much more for that the Queene of England then in being, was the indubitate eldest daughter and heire of King Edward the fourth, and sister and next heire to Edward the fifth? Neither wants there ancienter authority then any of the others, affirming, that this Idoll did usurpe the name of one of King Edwards sonnes; many arguments concurring to buttresse this affirmation. For, if at the

the same time (as Polydor writeth) it was bruted, that *the sonnes of King Edward the fourth had not * beene murthered under their usurping Vncle* Richard, but were escaped, and lived in obscurity beyond the Sea; how can that be true, which Stow and the rest (who follow Polydore therein) affirme, that Lambert was crowned King of England at Dublin in Ireland, as heire to George Duke of Clarence? For with what injurie to the royall brethren (fained to be alive) was that? Verily there seemes no coherence in the circumstances, nor apparence of truth in the substance. And how much stronger to the purpose of the Conspirators was the fiction of an Edward, the Kings sonne, and himselfe once proclaimed King, then of an Edward, who was but an Earle, and a Duke of Clarences heire; But you will aske, what was the poore Earles part in this tragedie? what other, then that by rumoring his murther, they might bring the person of King Henry into common detestation for his cruelty; For clearing whereof the King publikely afterward shewed the Earle to the view of all. And albeit the vulgar fame is, that Lambert was called Edward, yet * one who then lived, saith directly, that this Cypher was dubbed and mounted from his owne meane ranke to the title of a King, under the name of the second Brother, who for certaine was called Richard: but what Record there is to the contrary, is to us as yet unknowne; for our vulgar Bookes extant can hardly passe with a Jury of ordinary Criticks, and Censors for unchallengeable evidence.

(14) This aery Typhon (which grasped at the embracement of the two Kingdomes of England and Ireland) thus throughly schooled and instructed, is secretly convaied by his Sinonian Tutor to Dublin, the chiefe City of the Irish, where he was confident of partakers, as amongst the hereditary Clients, and adherents of the house of Yorke; which affection was first breathed into them by the cunning popularities of the Lord Richard Duke of Yorke, the first of that line, who publiquely claimed the Englih Crowne. His hopes deceived him not, for the Lord * Chancellor of Ireland, Thomas Fitz-Gerald (of the noble Famile of the Geraldines) presently professed himselfe for the plot, and by his authority and perswasions drew the generality of the Irish after him into it. Messengers are hereupon dispatched, upon all hands both into England, to such as they had hope of, and into low Germany to the Ladie Margaret, sister of King Edward the fourth, Dutchesse Dowager of Burgundy, a most mortall enemy of the Lancastrian Family. In both places the lighted matches of sedition found powdry spirits, and wonderfull correspondence. There is flocking from all parts to support the quarrell, and the Irish (to have the glory of giving England a King) proclaime and reverence this painted puffe, and flying bubble, with royall Style and honours.

(15) Henrie seeing the fire so strangely kindled round about the walls of his best hopes and strengths, fals seriously to counsell at the Monastery of Carthusian Monkes neere Richmond, where after exact deliberation it was decreed, 1. That generall pardon (to stay the mindes of as many as it was possible) should without any exception be proclaimed to such as from thenceforth should continue dutifull. Which was principally done to temper, and assure some private persons, as Sir Thomas Broughton and others, whose forces, wils, and wealth were held most in suspition. 2. That Elizabeth, late wife to Edward the fourth, and Mother in law to Henry now King of England, should forfeit all her lands and goods, for that (contrary to her faith given to them, who were in the plot for bringing in King Henry) shee had yeelded up her daughters to the hands of the Tyrant Richard. 3. That Edward Earle of Warwicke then prisoner in the Tower, should be openly shewed alive in London. All which was accordingly executed, but without any great fruit, for still the plot went on.

(16) The condemnation of Elizabeth Queene Dowager, rather moved envy towards Henry, then relieved his cause; for, to many the justice of that sentence was doubtfull, the circumstance of a Mother in law inferred a breach of pietie, and the judgement it selfe did also want example. The justice was doubtfull both in regard of the cause, and of the proceeding: Of the cause, for how could she have defended her Daughters by the priviledge of Sanctuary from such a Wolfe and Tyger, as would have infringed it for her Sonnes, had they not beene quietly delivered to his bloudy hands? The same Tyrant doth now demand her Daughters, as to honour, not to slaughter; but if it had beene to slaughter, what helpe; She, terrified with the motion, after much deliberation yeelds them to him, when shee neither could nor durst detaine them. But you say she violated her faith, and hazarded thereby the lives and hopes of all that were in the plot for her cause. A great crime certainely. But Richard was in title, and power a King, and hung over her head with inevitable terrours; when Henry of Richmond was but an Earle, and he farre off, and in banishment, and without any apparence of prevailing, and her selfe a friendlesse widdow. The manner or proceeding was no lesse strange; for by what law or triall was she condemned in a Præmunire? She nevertheless is put out of all, and confined to the Monastery of Bermondsey in Southwarke, where finally she ended her dayes, borne to be an example of both fortunes, having from a forlorne Widdowes estate beene raised to the Bed of a Batchelour Monarcke; and in his life time beene reduced to the seeming of a private fortune, when her Lord was driven to flie the Land; and afterward saw those turnes and varieties as few Queenes ever felt, or saw so many, or more contrary; whether wee regard the height of worldly felicity, when she did behold her Sonne a King, or the depth of misery, when the Tyrant invaded his Crowne and life, or now her Daughter being Queene, and her selfe a miserable prisoner. The consideration whereof, as it may worthily mortifie ambitious affections; so the strangenesse of the sentence verifies that collection among others, which * that learned Gentleman makes of this Kings raigne, in these words: Hee had (saith hee) a verie strange kinde of interchanging verie large and unexpected pardons with severe executions. Nevertheless, (his wisdome considered) it could not be imputed to any inequality, but to a discretion, or at least to a principle, that hee had apprehended, that it was not good, obstinately to pursue one course, but to try both wayes. Howsoever that was; certainely, shee being so just an object of his commiseration, who had married that Daughter, by which he enjoyed a Kingdome, and gotten that very power, wherewith hee ruined her; it cannot be reasonably thought, but that there were other most important motives, perswading such a sharpe course, or otherwise, that it must be reckoned among the chiefe of his errours. But as in the times of her flourishing estate, she founded and endowed a faire Colledge for Students in Cambridge, which of her is called the Queenes; so we will leave to those her Beneficiaries the farther search of this Argument, and deploration of her fortune, which seemes such to us, as if King Henry affected to leave somewhat in this example, wherewith to oppose and amaze the World. Vnlesse perhaps it were, that having proclaimed a generall pardon for all offences, without exception, to such as in future should remaine loyall, and fore-seeing that some, who might be willing to lay hold of that benefit, might also be cunningly practised-with to fall away, upon distrust of his word, when once he had served his present ses, he therefore meant (by so cleare a demonstration, as the utter undoing, and perpetuall imprisonment of his wives owne mother,) to give them assurance, that he, who upon her person had beene so severe a punisher of faith-breach, would never never violate it in his owne, and thereby secure them in that poynt, and secure himselfe of them.

False de la Pole Earle of Lincolne, and others, flie to the Dutchesse of Burgundy.

(17) Yet neither could this devise take so good effect, but that John Earle of Lincolne (sonne of John de la Pole Duke of Suffolke, and Elizabeth King Edward the fourths sister) secretly fled into Flanders to the Dutchesse of Burgundy, whither Francis Lord Lovel was likewise not long before escaped. Sir Thomas Broughton (another principall confederate) temporized in England, there to remaine a stay to the businesse, as well for mutuall intelligence, as receipt of an Army when it should arrive. This Earle of Lincolne, besides that he could not with any patience behold a Lancastrian weilding the English Scepter, was also of a * sharpe wit, and high reach, and therefore not without an ambitious sensibility, that in counrenancing King Henry, hee wronged that expectancie, and relation to the Crowne, which hee had in right of his Mother, sister to King Edward the fourth, and to King Richard the third, who had * designed him for heire apparant, and contracted his sister the * Lady Anne de la Pole, to Iames Prince of Scotland: was also the rather animated by * letters received from his Aunt the Dutchesse of Burgundy, earnestly calling upon him for his presence. This Dutchesse was the second wife of Charles Duke of Burgundie, * slaine by the *Switz*s at the battell of Nancé; by whom though hee had no issue, yet by reason of her great dower, and wise behaviour among the Dutch, she was strong in money and friends; all which she was willing to convert to the utter subversion, howsoever, of the Lancastrian line. Though therefore, she well knew that this Lambert was but an Idoll, * hammered out of the hote braine of that Boutefew Richard Simon, yet she embraceth the occasion, countenanceth the Impositure, and leaves nothing unsaid or undone, which might give life and successe to the enterprise. The Earle, the Lord Lovell, and others, she furnished abundantly, and joyneth unto them a renowmed Coronell Martin Swart, a Gentleman of * honorable birth, exemplary valour, and singular experience, and certaine selected Companies, to the number of about two thousand Almaines, which soone after arrive at Dublin. Lambert, who before was but proclaimed, is now in Christs Church there solemnely by them crowned King of England, * feasting and triumphing, rearing mighty shouts and cryes, carrying him thence to the Kings Castle upon tall mens shoulders, that he might be seene and noted; as he was surely (saith Stow) an honourable boy to looke upon; though nothing lesse was meant, then that he should enjoy that honour if they prevailed, as meaning then to erect Edward Earle of Warwicke. Posterity might worthily doubt of the truth of these so desperate impudencies, and ridiculous Pageants, practised in the highest affaires of mankinde, but that the thing is so universally testified, and also that the highest affaires of the world (when once they are passed) are little better then such like Pageants.

* Lambert crowned King of England at Dublin. Iohn Stow.

(18) King Henry (on the other side) though he had by most diligent espials endevoured to know the truth of Lamberts quality, to divert the streame of affections, which he saw inclined that way, for that the practise was carried with such wonderfull art, as that very many (otherwise discreet and sober men) were induced to beleeve that he was indeede King Edwards sonne; and although the generall pardon proclaimed by King Henry, did undoubtedly stay very many from open revolt, but much more the carefull watch which was kept at the Ports, to hinder the escape of Male-contents or factious Fugitives: yet he manifestly saw, that it would in the end come to a Field: for which cause he takes order for the levie of an Armie, resolving to give his enemies Battell with the first opportunity, it being the ancient and manfull fashion of the English (who are naturally most impatient of lingring mischiefes) to put their publique quarrels to the triall of the sword. Lambert attended with John Earle of Lincolne, Francis Lord * Vicount Lovell, Thomas Fitz-Gerald, or rather Maurice Fitz-Thomas (belike his sonne) and Coronell Swart, with an Army of desperate and picke Souldiers, as well English, Dutch, as Irish (all fired with infinite hopes and promises to be enjoyed upon the overthrow of King Henry) come on shoare in Lancashire at a place called the pile of Foudray, where they joyne with their assured Confederate Sir Thomas Broughton, and his sequell; and after some short refreshment in those parts, march with erected courages against King Henry, taking their way through Yorkeshire (the hoped Nursery of their surest friendships) and gloriously publishing their new King every where, though without any increase of force by concourse, (for King Henries wisdome had marred their errand,) their journey was directed toward Newarke upon Trent.

(19) The King then at Coventree, being by such scouts as he had appointed for that service, presently advertised of Lamberts arriuall, and having his forces ready under the conduct of Jasper Duke of Bedford, & the Earle of Oxford, (because delay, in this case, was on all hands reputed mischievous,) sets forward to Nottingham, and by a Wood side called Bowrs, encampeth his people; in whom there appeared a gallant forwardnes to revenge themselves, by the sword, of that indignitie, which was offered to the English name by strangers and Rebels, who durst hope to give them a Ruler. Thither repaired George Talbot Earle of Shrewsbury, George Lord Strange his sonne, Sir John Cheinie, and other noble and valiant Gentlemen with their numbers, which added no small finewes to King Henries musters. Polydor * hath diligently set downe the names of such principall men in those parts as repayred thither, partly voluntary, partly sent-for to the common defence of the King and Kingdome; but without due additions of each mans degree and place of precedency; yet their names doe well deserve to be remembred, both for the honour of their Families, and examples of loyalty. Hee recounteth sixtie five Captaines which assembled from places thereabout, under whom there cannot probably be thought fewer Souldiers then eight or tenne thousand, the English usually, till of late, having commonly an hundreth and fiftie in a Company. Their surnames (besides Edward Lord * Hastings) are in him as followeth; Longford, Montgomerie, Vernon of the Peke, Shurley, Folgeham, Grisley, Sutton, Stanley, and Stanley, Houghton, Meryng, Stanhop, Clifton, Stapleton, Willoughby, Perpoint, Babington, Bedyll, * Brudenel, Markham, Merbury, Borough, Tyrwit, Hussey, Shefeild, Newport, Ormeston, Tempest, Knywett, Willoughby, Dygby, and Dygby, Harrington, Sacheverel, Fyllers, Fylding, Poulney, Faux, Gryne, Gryffin, Lucy, Belknap, Throgmorton, Gray of Ruthin, Wollston, Fynder, Philips, Cheney, Cotton, S. John, Mordant, Terell, Rainsford, Paynton, Daniel, Marney, Armidel. From the uttermost bounds of the North, there repayred also other chiefe persons and leaders (saith he) as * Ogle, * Neuyle, * Latimer, Bulmer, Langford, Norres, Neuyle of Thortunbrig, and Williams. The Earle of Lincolne nevertheless comes forward with his Counter-King, nothing perhaps adding greater courage to that side, then the example of Henry himselfe, who with lesse numbers (but much more secret Art) prevayled in a pight field at Bosworth: his meaning was to get into Newarke. The King wakefull upon all advantages, and perfectly instructed of his enemies courses (whom desperation did thrust forward to a daring hope) dislodgeth with his Army, and passeth through Newarke, leaving it behinde him about three miles, to intercept the Lambertines; and there fits downe againe. The Earle of Lincolne encampes with great bravery and shew of courage in the face of the Kings forces.

of Coronell Swart, and others, to the best advantage; upon the * Brow or hanging of an Hill, expecting the charge. The Almaines were all of them hardie and approved men, and throughly well-appoynted, and so in likelihood were such English as stood for that side; but the Irish, besides multitudes and fiercenesse, had small provision, save (after the rude manner of their Nation) darts, skeins, or the like. The maine of the Battell rested wholly upon the English and Almaines. King Henry on the other side, (as he that thirsted for an end of this bloudy dayes worke,) speedily disposed his whole numbers into three Battalions: the Vaward whereof was best replenished with store of choise and picked men, well armed and appoynted, and fortified with wings. The armie being thus ordered, Andreas saith that King Henrie useth this speech.

"(21) Most faithfull Lords, and you most valiant "Companions in Armes, who have (together with "us) endured so great perils by Land and Sea; loe, "wee are againe, against our wils, drawne to trie our "fortunes in another Field. For the Earle of Lincolne (a perjured man) without any occasion minis- "stred by us, defends an unjust quarrell against us: "neither doth he it dissemblingly, but most openly "campeth, without any feare of God; not so much "onely to endammage us, as to fulfill the humour of "a giddie, and intemperate-tongued woman, who is "not ignorant that her bloud was extinguished by "her Brother Richard; but because that line did al- "wayes maintaine a most deadly fewd against ours, "shee (without any great regard to her Neece, my "deareft Confort) assayes to destroy as well us as our "posteritie. Yee fee therefore how often wee are "provoked by them; but they shall not carrie it a- "way unrevenged. God therefore and his holy An- "gels we first call to witnesse, that we are provident "both night and day for your safetie, and for the "Common quiet; though thus the ancient enemy "repugneth. But God, a just, strong, and patient "Iudge, will also bring a remedy to this evill In the "meane time we exhort and admonish you, that the "consideration of our just inheritance be at this pre- "sent more forceable with you, then their wicked- "nesse; neither doubt, but that the same God, who in "the former warre made us victorious, will enable "us to triumph now also over these enemies. Let us "therefore set upon them courageously; for God is "upon our side to assist us.

(22) The Earle of Oxford, (on the behalfe of the whole Army) was prepared to make answere, but the King hastening to the proofe, brake off all Ceremonies; and the signe of Battell given, they thunder forward with shouts of people, and sound of martiall musicke, and like a blacke tempest, powre themselves upon the Front of the Enemies Batrels; who rushed forward with equall violence and furie, as men that at once encountred against feare and fortune. The fight continued doubtfull above * three houres. A long space for men of courage to be employed in killing one the other, and fit to glut the hunger of furie. The Earles English wanted nothing but a good cause, and the Almains gave not place to the Kings people in any poynt worthy of gallant Souldiers, but sold their lives dearely, and their Coronell Swart had scarce any before him in personall performance. Neither were the Irish behinde for their parts, if their skinnes had beene sword-proofe, for the contempt of death was alike in them as the rest. Briefly, the wonder of that dayes worke was, that Christian men, in no sounder a quarrell, could dare to die so boldly, such chiefly, as the Earle of Lincolne, and some others, who knew the secret of that desperate enterprize. But God, the Lord of revenges; punishing their unjust malice, with a suddaine whirlewinde, rising in the heate of the Battell, (even as when Constantine fought against the enemies of the Church) our Souldiers, who seemed vanquished, became victorious. For the Kings vant-gard * re-enforced it selfe, and gave so furious a re-charge, (in likelihood upon this encouragement sent as it were from Heaven) that it utterly brake the Enemies squadrons, and giving in among them with full randon, flew * first such Captaines as resisted, and put the residue which yeelded not, either to the sword or flight. Herewith the whole Armie * shouted, the Trumpets sound victory, and the generall crie runnes King Henrie, King Henrie. When the battell and chase were ended, so that there was time and leasure to view the field, it then appeared what mindes the slaine bodies carried; for all the chiefe Captaines, the Earle of Lincolne himselfe (though the King would gladly have had him fived, to come thereby to a greater light of his dangers) the Lord Lovell, Sir Thomas Broughton, Coronell Swart, and * Maurice Fitz-Thomas, Generall of the Irish, were (like * Catiline and his Complices) found to cover those places dead, which they defended living, among foure thousand other Souldiers which were sluine upon that side. The King at this Battell lost * almost halfe the People in his Vantgard, and Surgeons had store of worke among the Survivers, so that the Garland gained at this journey was not undipt in bloud; Howbeit there is no mention that any man of honour or speciall note, fell upon the Kings side.

(23) Among the Prisoners was the Counterfeit himselfe, and the lewd contriver of this wicked stratagem, Richard Simon, who with little change may most truely be called another Simon. The King, (who reserved himselfe in this battell, as in others, but * never retired) made both their persons examples of his clemency. For Lambart being questioned, how such a * breeching-boy as he was, durst attempt so great a wickednesse, denied not, that he was compelled thereunto, by certaine bad persons, who were of that conspiracy; and as for his parents quality, he confest them to be such as indeed they were; altogether of base and despicable calling. * Simon subtill, or Sir Richard Simon the Priest, whether for discovery of some great secrets, or the extraordinary reverence borne to his function (extraordinary say wee, for otherwise * Priests had beene openly put to death) was not executed, but * condemned to a dungeon, and perpetuall shackles. Lambert (whom the glittering periwig of regall style did but lately so adorne) was condemned to * the Kings kitchen, there to manage spits at the fire; who if his wit and spirit had answered his late Titles, would have chosen much rather to have beene turned from the Ladder by an hangman. But * having in this abject condition given sufficient proofe that he was but a Puppet, or a property in the late tragicall motion, * he was at length (promoted we cannot say) made one of the Kings Falconers, in which estate it seemes hee lived and died inglorious. This Battel was fought upon a * Saturday, a day of the week which is * observed to have beene favourable and luckie to this Henry. His first care after the victory setled, was that which most became a religious Prince, the humble and joyous acknowledgement of thankes to God, in the very place. From thence he passeth to * Lincolne, where he spent three dayes in publike supplications, Processions, and thanksgivings, and sent his Standard to our Ladies Church at Walsingham in Norfolke, there to remaine as a Monument of his victorie and gratitude. Such as were taken in the Battell or Chase, are then executed. From Lincolne hee progresseth into Yorkeshire, where he tooke a severe course, as well by execution, as ranfome, for purging those parts from such as were culpable, or probably dangerous. At Newcastle about the * middle of August, he dispatcheth his experienced and trusty Agent Richard Fox Bishop of Exceter, and Sir Richard Edgcombe Knight into Scotland, there to settle a peace with King Iames the third, to empeach the retreat and protection which his enemies and Rebels found therein. Himselfe having spent a great part of Summer in this progresse, or rather itinerary Justicing, returnes by Leicester toward London. Those prudent Ambassadors fadors in the meane time negociating with the Scottish King, wrought* him to be more inclinable to a perpetuall peace; then it stood with his safetie to let his Subjects understand, who favoured him not. Seaven yeares truce is consented unto, with a secret promise of King Iames to renew that terme, as it began to expire; with which assurance the Ambassadours returning; gladded their wise Soveraignes heart; who thereby found that the Bishop of Exceter, was no lesse industrious in preserving his Regall state, then he had beene prudent in furthering Him unto it. The fire-brands and readiest fuell of Rebellion thus seemed to be quenched, and the King beholds himselfe in the Grace and favour of his people, nor lesse of forraine Princes; Margaret Dutchesse of Burgundy (his implacable* Iuno) excepted; whom the newes of her Nephewes the Earle of Lincolnes death, and the bloudy blowing up of all her late hopefull and costly contrivements, did gall and wound extreamely; but added fresh appetites of revenge to her former immortall malice, which* never gave over working, till she had vented another no lesse prodigy then Lambert was. But the King being honoured and fought unto, as well by a *Nuncio from the Romane See, who obtayned leave to publish a Croisado here against the Turkes, as also from the French; after his many labours, as well Martiall as Civill, sustained on behalfe of himselfe and the Common-weale, makes a triumphall* entry into London, which was adorned in the best manner. And in the same moneth upon * Saint Katherines day, his wife Elizabeth was Crowned Queene of England, as if that then first he had held himselfe assured of Royall estate: for he saw not what dangerous lifts would yet be given by that unquiet Ladies practises, to heave him out of authority.

(24) The next maine action which fitted the judgement, and tride the sinewes of King Henry, was a forraigne case, of more difficulty and Art, then of intestine danger, as in which the high and paramount respects of Common-weale were intangled, or encountred with offices most neerely concerning the honour of a Princes minde, which never is more blemished then with the note of ingratitude. A dispute and combate betweene wisdome and bloud, publique and private, (if any quality, or action of a King may be said to be private) which seemed worthy of so excellent, cleare, and considerate a discourse, as that of Henries. You heard what notable favours and humanities, when he lived a banisht Earle in the Continent, he had received, first of the Duke of Britain, then of Charles K. of France; so that hee stood equally (as it were) obliged to them both, and could acknowledge no lesse. Charles (more ambitiously then justly) desired exceedingly to annexe Britaine to the Crowne of France, taking occasion of the time, and other circumstances, which all seemed to conspire with his affections. The Duke olde, and the father of one onely daughter surviving till marriage; Maximilian King of Romans, and rivall of King Charles in the same desires, (as well for the Dutchy, as the Daughter,) feeble in meanes; and King Henry as well obnoxious to the French for benefits, as busied in his particular at home: and the Duke of Britaine, by succouring Lewis Duke of Orleance, and other French Lords, whom King Charles reputed his adversaries, ministred to the French an occasion (or colour at least) of warring upon Britaine, and so by the apt concurrence of circumstances, to annexe it by conquest, if by treaty hee could not. Henry of England now knowne to be victoriously setled, seemes worth the Courting. Ambassadors come from the French, who lay open the wrong offered by the Britaines, in succouring the enemies of France, put Henry in minde of passed benefits; and pray his assistance, or at the least a neutrality; but altogether concealing the mystery of this warre, which was to annexe Britaine to the Crowne of France. Howsoever, Henry, though he well enough knew, that a King must ever bee the best part of his Councell, (for what are others opinions, if himselfe want the happinesse, or judgement, to choose the best?) propounds the points to his privy Councell, whereupon he Christianly offers himselfe a Mediatour betweene the French and Britaine; an office, in which it was apparant hee might best satisfie all obligations and duties both to God and them. The French pretend liking, but in the meane time follow their designe hard. Henry sends his Chaplen Mr. Christopher Urswicke a man* whom he very often imployed. The French maske on. Things come to some extremities. It becomes manifest that King Charles abused the King of Englands credulity; for the City of Nants in Britaine was brought by siege to point of yeelding, while messengers, and packers, outwardly oyled with the name of peace, slide to and fro, and the French doubt nothing so much, as lest the English should stirre, before their victory had made Britaine irrecoverable. The Lord Woodvile (as without the Kings will, or privity) slips over into Britaine with three or foure hundred choise men, to assist the Duke, and came time enough to be slaine with almost all his Souldiers, at the battell of Saint Albine, where the French wanne the day; notwithstanding that the Britaines, the rather to appall their enemies, had apparelled * feaveneene hundred of their own Souldiers in white Coates with red Crosses, after the English manner, & made therby a shew of two Regiments of English. The Britaines had a great losse in that battell, wherein they were made fewer by sixe thousand. The Duke of Orleance and Prince of Orange, who then were British in faction, were taken prisoners in the same fight. The French lost about twelve hundreth, and their Generall an Italian. So that the state of Britaine seemed ripe for a fall.

(25) But King Henry, having long since suspected, and fore-seene, what the uttermost marke of the French might be, and seeming to have enough suffered the intereste, which they might expect in him as a man, to be abused by their practises, to the prejudice of his other friend, the Duke of Britaine, (who forgat not to follicite and urge that point) had made the quality of this affaire knowne to the body of State in open Parliament, for that purpose assembled; as meaning by authority thereof to purge himselfe from all imputation, if, as a King, he did that which the reason of Government required, which would not assent that Britaine should be made French, left by that accession their Neighbourhood might grow intollerable, Britaine having so many Sea-townes and out-lets to mischiefe the English trafficke. Himselfe was otherwise also sufficiently resolved, that the generall good ought to predominate the particular, and that his private obligations ought not to entangle, or prejudice the publike service. The Parliament therfore, considering that which stood for the Common-weale, decrees aide of men and money, on behalfe of the Duke of Britaine; it being (besides all other respects) a perillous example, to suffer the great to devoure the lesser Neighbour-States, upon pretences of justice, or revenge. Forces are levied; but (for respect of King Charles, and in hope that the shew of preparations would stoope him to equall conditions,) not yet so roundly, as the Britaines necessities expected. Meane-while that no formality or Princely ceremony should be un-accomplished, King Henrie by his Ambassadors certifies King Charles of his Parliaments decree; prayes him to desist from farther Hostility; otherwise that he must assist the Duke, but yet (for the French Kings sake) with this reservation, of pursuing his subjects no where but in Britaine. Charles made small account of these overtures, because hee truely perswaded himselfe that the English aides would not arrive in season; which fell out accordingly; for before that time, the French had gotten that victory, (whereof even now wee spake) at the Battell of Saint Albine. Vpon newes whereof, the English Regiments were immediatly sent over under Robert Lord Broke, Broke Generall, Sir Iohn Cheiney, Sir Iohn Middleton, Sir Rafe Hilton, Sir Richard Corbet, Sir Thomas Leighton, Sir Richard Lacon, and Sir Edmund Cornewall, Knights, and Coronels. The whole Army contained eight thousand men. These march toward the enemy; who, acquainted with the temper of the English, whiles they are fresh, as * being then almost invincible, containe themselves within their Campe; but yet * molest the English with continuall skirmishes on horse-backe in severall places at once; finally to the profit of the French, who * were alwaies put to the worse, the Archers received them with such perpetuall stormes. In the meane space, Francis Duke of Britaine dyes, leaving in effect, one onely daughter, the Lady Anne, (for the other, * being the younger) deceased not long after. This altered the whole state of the case. The British Nobilitie (under their young Mistresse) immediately fall at variance among themselves, and the English thereby were on every hand in danger: so that God (as it appeared by the sequell) had destined Britaine to be annexed to the Crowne of France; for the English (after five moneths stay) were in wisdome compelled to returne; the rather, for that Winter now was come upon them, and Britaine, destitute of competent defence, (her Rulers disagreeing among themselves) was finally by the marriage of King Charles with the Lady Anne, made a parcell of the French Monarchy, as hereafter will appeare.

(26) King Henry the while was againe in danger to have had prefent use of Souldiers at home. We shewed, what care was heretofore taken by him to weed the North, and free it from lurking enemies. That notwithstanding, when the Earle of Northumberland, Lieutenant of the North) signified at an Assembly (according as the truth was) that the King (though the Northerne people had besought it) would not remit one penny of such Subsidie, as was granted in Parliament for supportation of the warres in Britaine, * lest the Acts of State should be reversed at the rude peoples pleasure; but that on the contrary, Commission and warrant was sent downe for him to see the same levyed by distresse, or otherwise: the desperate multitude, fatally supposing that the Earle was the occasion of such an answer, did suddenly set upon him at the incitement of one Iohn à Chamber, and furiously murdered him, with certaine of his servants in a place called Cockledge by Thrusk, eighteene miles from Yorke. They to carry their wicked attempt through, make head under Sir Iohn Egremond, a discontented Knight of those parts, openly declaring where they came, that their meaning was to fight with the King in defence of their liberties, as if the cause leffe killing of a most noble Lord had beene one of them. Thomas Howard Earle of Surrey sent from Court with some forces to represse their increase, skirmisheth with a route of these Rebels, beats them away, and takes Iohn à Chamber prisoner. The whole swarme flockes to Yorke, where they roosted about three or foure dayes, when hearing of the Kings approach (who was ever one of the first in the necke of such occasions) they scattered themselves, but the Ring-leaders were hanged and quartered, and Iohn à Chamber, with some others, were executed at Yorke after an extraordinary manner. Sir Iohn Egremond escaping, fled to the common Center of all King Henries dangers and enmities, Margaret Dutchesse of Burgundy, so that though the colour of rising was about money, yet Egremond at least had reference, it seemes, to the generall perturbation of the Kingdome, upon the old ground of quarrell (hatred of the Lancastrian Family) and this to be but a sparke or flash of that great and troublous fire, which afterward brake forth and blazed so prodigiously. The Earle of Surrey is left by the King (having * severely punished the murtherers) Lieutenant of the North, and Sir Robert Tonstall Knight, as chiefe Commissioner for levying the Taxe or Subsidie.

(27) The unworthy death of the Earle of Northumberland, was seconded by a more unworthy, of Iames the third King of Scotland, so as King Henry lost at home a most honourable stay of his Northerne affaires, and a sure Ally abroad. This unfortunate Prince, having * by some irregularitie of life, and partialities, and errours of government (amplified perhaps by the constructions and reports of his malignant Subjects) incurred extreame hatred with many of the Nobilitie and people, laboured with * King Henry, as also with the Pope, and King of France, to make an accord betweene him and his Mutinadoes, for that they had compelled Prince Iames, his Sonne, to bee the titular and unnaturall Head of those armes, which traiterously (as pretending to have a right on behalfe of the Common-weale to depose an evill King) they assumed against him. The Kings accordingly interposed their mediations by earnest Ambassadors, but could obtaine no other then this outragious answer: That there was no talking of peace, unlesse hee would resigne his Crowne. King Henry and King Charles vehemently protested against these their whole proceedings, declaring by their Ambassadour, that they thought the same to be as a common injury done unto themselves; and the example to bee very wicked and pernicious, and not sufferable by Princes, that Subjects should be permitted to put hands unto their Soveraigne. Hereupon it came to a Battell at Banocksborne by Strivelin, whereat King Iames (rashly fighting before his whole numbers were come) was notwithstanding the contrary commandement of the Prince his Sonne) slaine in the Mill, of that Field, whither he fled after the Battell ended. By reason of this infortunate precipitation of the Scottish King, Hadrian de Castello an Italian Legate, whom Pope Innocentius the eight had sent to take up the cruell quarrell, came too late, (for he arrived not in England till the Battell at Banocksborne was passed,) but not too late to receive honour at the hands of King Henry, who respecting his wisedome and excellent learning, (upon the speciall commendations first * of Iohn Morton Archbishop of Canterbury, but afterward upon his owne experience of the Man in sundry employments to the Romane See,) bestowed upon him the Bishopricke of Hereford, and (after resignation thereof) the Bishopricke of Bath and Wells; who was also at the length created Cardinall by Pope Alexander the sixth. * But who is hee among many thousands (saith Polydor) that useth not to admire these outward honours which may alike bee given to the unworthy as well as to the well-deserving, and may alike be taken away from either? But the praise of this Hadrian is of another farre more noble kinde and eternall: for hee was the man who first revived the glory of the ancient Latine eloquence, and of all other sorts of obscruse and exquisite learnings, as in which himselfe excelled. Thus doth Polydor (himselfe an Italian,) celebrate the learning of his Country-man, of whose other qualities, yet others write more harshly; as that out of meere ambition to be Pope, without any other grudge) hee conspired with Alphonso Petruccio, and other sacred Cardinals, to murther Pope Leo the tenth: induced thereto by suggestion of a Witch, who fore-told him that one Hadrian, an old man, of meane parentage, of great learning and wisdome, should succeed in the Papacy. The man thought it must needs be himselfe, as being, though of very base Parentage, yet of some noble qualities: but another * Hadrian, the sonne of a Dutch Brewer, and instructer of Charles the fifth the Emperour, prooved to be the man; and this our Hadrian lost by depravation all his promotions whatsoever, for his nefarious attempt. Into such extreame folly is learning and wisdome metamorphosed, where it is tainted with Ambition, or wants a Religious discretion to manage it aright.

(28) And albeit the King himselfe could very gladly have spent his time in the studies of peace, as those which were far more apt for the service of God and for attaining of knowledge, then in martiall tumults; yet the qualitie of his super-eminent place envied unto him that felicitie; for he was necessarily drawne into a war with France upon lesse occasions. Anne the young Dutchesse of Britaine, (by their advise, who affected to preserve the liberty of that Dukedome, which by union with France, would be absorpt and extinguished) had so farre entangled and engaged her selfe with the Procurators of Maximilian King of Romans, that she was not onely publiquely contracted, but contented (for uttermost performance of those rites whereof marriage by proxie was honourably capable) to take upon her the Bride, and being solemnly bedded, to permit Maximilians Deputie, in the presence of sundry Noble witnesses, as well men as women, to put in his legge, ſtript naked to the knee, betweene the ſpouſall ſheetes, that ceremony seeming to amount to a Conſummation. Charles King of France, notwithſtanding theſe ſolemnities, and his owne particular engagement with the Lady Margaret daughter of Maximilian, (whom for the purpoſe of marriage he had already entertained into France,) did ſo ambitiouſly and vehemently covet to gaine Britaine, that upon confidence of his force, he reſolved to breake through all reſpects, and not onely to offend all his forraine friends, but to make them his juſt enemies, rather then to faile in effectuation. Inſtruments are therefore very ſecretly ſet on worke, and battery is placed with bags of gold at all the opportunities which might let in his purpoſe. Ambaſſadors alſo (the* Lord Francis of Luxemburg, Charles Martinian, and Robert Gagwine, * Generall of the Order of the holy Trinitie, are diſpatched to Henry, praying that with his good-will he might diſpoſe of the body of the Lady Anne in marriage, according to the right which he had thereunto, as the chiefe Lord of whom ſhe held the Dukedome. Henry denied the requeſt, but yeelded notwithſtanding to ſend Ambaſſadors into France there to Capitulate about a Peace. The French carryed this affaire with notable Art, for to divert the world for looking into the depth of their drift, King Charles ſtill detained the young Lady Margaret, Maximilians daughter; ſo as at moſt it could be but ſuſpected, that Charles as at moſt it could be but ſuſpected, that Charles meant to match her with ſome of his bloud, and all the entercourſe at Orators and Ambaſſadors uſed in the meane time, tended but to hold the Engliſh buſied upon other objects, till they had wrought their feate in the Court of Britaine. For Maximilian, (to let the world ſee what injuries ſhall be offered even to Kings, that are not ſtrong) him they altogether neglected; King Henry they played with, and Ferdinando King of Caſtile (who was ready to joyne with Maximilian and Henry * againſt the French) they reſolve to appeaſe, with rendring up unto him the Counties of Ruſcinoon, and Perpinian; as accordingly they * did, without re-emburſement of one penny of thoſe 300000. Crownes, for which John King of Arragon (father to Ferdinando) had morgaged them. The young Ladies doubts, riſing either out of Religion, or point of honour, his cunning Agents, and Emiſſaries wipe away with theſe ſolutions. That Maximilians daughter was not of yeares to conſent, and therefore the contract betweene King Charles and her, did not binde either in law, or conſcience: That her owne contract with Maximilian was voide, for that it was done without the conſent of her Soveraigne Lord, King Charles, whoſe Ward or Client ſhe was. The Lady vanquiſhed in her judgement with theſe reaſons, attracted with the preſent greatneſſe of King Charles, and loath by refuſall to make her Country the ſeat of a long and miſerable warre, ſecretly yeelded to accept of another husband. Thomas Goldſtone Abbot of Saint Auguſtines in Canterbury, and Thomas Earle of Ormond in Ireland, King Henries Ambaſſadors into France, having beene dandled by the French during theſe illuſive practiſes, returned without other fruit of their labours.

(29) What could now the moſt patient doe leſſe then take Sword in hand upon ſo palpable and unworthy illuſion? But Maximilians wrongs were too impudent and intollerable; for Charles ſent home the Lady Margaret, and married the Inheritrix of Britaine, annexing it to his owne Realme: whereas King Henry found himſelfe rather mocke, then otherwiſe empayred. James Contibald hereupon comes Ambaſſadour from Maximilian, and obtained his requeſt; which was, that they with joynt forces ſhould by a certaine day preſixed, invade the French, in full revenge of theſe their bold provocations; Maximilian for his part, promiſing to ſupport that warre with at leaſt ten thouſand men for two yeares. King Henry having formerly in abundant manner provided himſelfe of treaſure, was ready before the day with a royall armie: but Maximilian (whoſe will to worke the uttermoſt miſchiefe to France was not doubted,) being ſent unto by King Henry, ſignifying his forwardneſſe, was found utterly unfurniſhed. Cauſes of Maximilians weakeneſſe in ſtate, were the Rebellions and diſlikes of his Flemiſh Subjects, cheriſhed by the French, the jealouſie of Princes neighbourhood, making them unjuſtly glad either of others moleſtations. For ſubduing whereof, though King Henry had heretofore given him good and ſucceſſefull aſſiſtance, under the conduct of Giles Lord Dawbeney, Governour of Callis, the Lord Morley, and others, whereby he the rather overcame; yet was he the feebler, as then, by reaſon of ſo freſh exhauſtures. King Henry with good cauſe was not a little troubled at theſe newes, ſecretly ſignified by his truſtie Almner M. Chriſtopher Vrſwick, and Sir Richard Riſley Knight, his Ambaſſadors to Maximilian; For he was very loath to undergoe ſo great an Action upon his particular ſtrengths, though hee doubted not to finde a potent partie among the Britaines, whoſe affections were as yet but looſely ſetled toward King Charles,) and yet farre more loath to deceive the expectation of his owne people, who had ſo largely contributed; Chiefely the Citie of London, out of which, even in thoſe dayes, he received for his furniture in that voyage almoſt * ten thouſand pounds from the Commoners, and (as it ſeemes by our Author) two hundreth pounds beſides from every Alderman, where the ſame King could not, but with ſome difficultie, levy in the third yeare of his Raigne a loane of foure thouſand pounds, whereof three of the beſt Companies are noted (as for having done and deſerved extraordinarily, to have lent above nine hundred. And verily this wiſe King (knowing how great a ſtrength that rich Citie was unto him) humoured that people with all ſorts of popularities, for himſelfe did not onely come among them, and cauſe himſelfe to be entred a Brother, in * one of their Companies, but ware the habite at a publike Feaſt, and ſate as Maſter, as is very credibly reported out of the Records of their Hall. His wiſdome therefore ſaw, that in giving over the invaſion of France; he ſhould ſloathfully abandon a goodly occaſion of making himſelfe univerſally acceptable to his people. His reſolutions therefore are by him at leaſt-wiſe pretended to continue, and for that cauſe he ſufficiently encreaſeth his numbers, that he might ſeeme able to goe through with that enterprize alone; and though the time of yeare were too farre ſpent (for he landed not at Callis, till the ſixth day of October) yet marcheth he with his whole forces toward Bologne, being well aſſured that with this trowell he ſhould at once plaiſter two wals, that is, humor his Engliſh ſubjects, and for a peace draw to himſelfe ſtore of Crownes from the French.

Dawbeny, Abergenny, Delaware, South, Haſtings, Cobham, &c. But it is needleſſe to weary our ſelves with long relations of a ſhort voyage, for King Henry, before hee ſet forth out of England, was ſecretly dealt with by the Lord Cordes Governor of Henault, according to inſtructions on the French Kings behalfe, to accept of conditions, which till Bologne was beſieged (as now by him it was) was not knowne. The ignorance of this myſtery made many forward Gentlemen to morgage their lands, and runne into much debt for their fuller and braver furniture, in hope to get great matters in this warre, whereof to their griefe they found themſelves deceived. In the meane time the Lord * Cordes, having met at Callis with Richard Fox Lord Biſhop of Exceſter, and * Giles Lord Dawbeney, the Kings Commiſſioners; after juſt and long debatement, concluded upon Articles of Peace betweene the two Kings.

(31) Bologne was brought to ſome diſtreſſe, when by intervention of this agreement it remained ſafe and quiet: King Charles was chiefly moved to buy his peace at a deare rate, both for that the ſtate of Britaine was as yet unſetled, and for that he meant forthwith to march into Italy for the * conqueſt of the Kingdome of Naples; and King Henry on the other ſide was not unwilling, becauſe Maximilian had fayled, and Britaine ſeemed clearely paſt poſſibilitie of eviction. To which may be added, a naturall, noble, and religious inclination in King Henry, to live in amity with his neighbours; the inckling of new * dangers, then in brewing againſt him by the turbulent, and unappeaſeable Dutcheſſe of Burgundy, and * cheriſhed by King Charles; and laſtly, the enrichment of himſelfe by re-emburſing the charges both of this, and the Britiſh warre, out of the French elſewhere, whereby he ſhould farre the better be able to withſtand all forraine practiſes, or domeſticke outrages. As for the preſerving of himſelfe, and his honour with his Subjects, he wanted not both true and honourable gloſſes: Such as were the care to avoyde unneceſſary effuſion of Chriſtian bloud: the uſes of his preſence at home, beſides many other: but his wiſdome in the carriage of this right weighty action was chiefly eminent in this: That hee would not enter into Treatie, till hee was in the Field; and that with ſuch a puiſſance, as was likely enough to force his owne conditions; nor ſuffer the leaſt ſigne of his ſecret willingneſſe to peace, or inward doubt of troubles at home; to creepe out at any Crany or Chinke of his diſcourſe or carriage, whereby hee as farre outwent the French fairely, as they formerly ſeemed to have over-wrought him ſubtlely. Had they truely beene informed in theſe points, it is probable they might have gone a cheaper way to worke: for, beſides what other Articles ſoever, it was concluded, That Henry ſhould * not quit his claime to France; but that for a Peace, which by the contract was onely to continue during the two Kings lives, Charles of France ſhould pay in preſent to Henry for his charges in that warre, * ſeven hundred fortie and five thouſand * Duckets, and twentie five thouſand Crownes yearely toward the expences which hee had heretofore been at in aiding the Britains. Which (by the Engliſh called Tibrute) was duely paide during all this Kings raigne, and alſo to Henry his Son, till the whole debt was run out, thereby to preſerve amitie with England. There were moreover (by Henries conſent, who was thus content to gratifie his Peeres at anothers coſt) not onely preſent rewards, but alſo certaine annuall penſions allotted to the chiefe Lords of his Privie-Councell. A courſe of bountie which might otherwiſe have proved prejudicious to the ſervice of the King of England, by engaging his Counſellors affections to the French: The ſiege of Bologne laſted till the eight day of November, and Henry (whom his Queenes moſt * tender, frequent, and loving lines, did the rather invite to ſpeedieſt returne,) having ſetled all his tranſmarine affaires, * arrived at Dover, from whence he journied to Weſtminſter, there to celebrate the Feaſt of Chriſtmas. This voyage into France, affording no greater exploites then we have heard, was celebrated by blind * Bernard with hyperbolicall and wellborne Verſes, not ordinary, in which directing his ſpeech in honour of Henry, to the Howres hee concludes.

(32) The famous counterfeiſance of Perkin Warbecke, with which the braine of the Lady Margarets Dutcheſſe Dowager of Burgundie had long travelled, doth now begin to diſcloſe it ſelfe, and make new buſineſſes for King Henry. The inglorious glory of the firſt invention in his raigne of this kinde of vexation, Lambert Simnels perſon had given to his Maſter the wily Simon, ſo that our Dutcheſſe was but an imitattrix, and yet perhaps ſhe gave not place in any point to the firſt example, or Archtype, nevertheleſſe the fortune of the firſt deviſe, being no more ſucceſſefull then it was, might reaſonably have deterred her from the edition of a ſecond: but whether it were an immortall envie toward the Lancaſtrian race, or a burning zeale of advancing one that might at leaſtwiſe beare the name of a Plantagenet, though by any ſiniſter practiſes; as if it had beene lawfull to attaine her ends (admit them juſt) by any injurious courſes, ſhee reſolves to erect another Idoll, as perceiving by the firſt, how notable an engine impoſture was, to trouble Henry; being well aſſured, that England was full of corrupt humors, and ill-affections to worke upon, nor ſo much through the deſert of her preſent King, as for that the dregges which naturally reſide in the bottom of mens hearts, where moſt bloudy and barbarous factions have for a long time weltered, and wurried one the other with various event, were not cleanſed and avoyded. The Divell therefore ready to furniſh all attempts which may raiſe trouble, and miſchiefe, eaſily fitted her. There was come therefore to her hands a youth adorned with ſuch a ſhape, as might eaſily perſwade the beholders was worthy of a noble fortune: he had thereunto a naturall fine wit, and (by reaſon of his abode in England in King Edwards daies) could ſpeake our language, as alſo ſome other, which he had by a kind of wandring travell obtained. This youth was borne (ſay they) in the Citie of Torney, and called * Peter Warbecke, the * ſon of a converted Iew, whoſe God-father at Baptiſme King Edward himſelfe was. The Engliſh in * contempt (and for a note perhaps of his forraine birth) did afterward call him by a diminutive of his name, Peterkin or Perkin. Him the Dutcheſſe (as a fit peece of timber, out of which to carve a new Idoll) moulds by degrees, and makes him take ſhape according to that Idea, which ſhe had preſigured in her working imagination, before the which the late honours of her houſe conſpicuous in three Princes (which altogether made not twentie and five yeares of raigne) did ſo perpetually hover, as her ſoule could never take contentment, but in the hope that the Houſe of Yorke ſhould againe be the dwelling place of Majeſty.

(33) Her offence againſt Henry wanted not many ſeeming reaſons, but none ſo great as that hee had ſlaine her owne brother King Richard, who albeit he was the reputed murtherer of her Nephewes, yet were they a degree more removed from her, and ſo leſſe deere in likelihood then a brother; and howſoever ſhee might ſecretly deteſt, or beleeve the commitment of that patricide, yet could ſhe never brooke (ſeeing they were gone) that the reward of her Brothers death, and that even to him who ſlew him, ſhould be the Crowne of England, whereby not onely her brother, but the whole male-line of her Family was for ever to be excluded; much leſſe could ſhe (a Plantagenet) abide that Henry, who brought to the Crowne the ſur-name of a newly raiſed Family. Theſe and other conſiderations in the breaſt of a Lady, bred up in a dominating Family, her ſelfe a Dowager, in ſuch a fortune, as in which ſhe was Paramount for the time, and abſolute without controlment, being careleſſe withall of ſaving for poſteritie, becauſe ſhe was without a Child, and in that regard the more abundantly ſtored with treaſure; all which made her ſpirits over-boyle with impatience and virulency; ſo farre forth, that having infuſed all her principles into Peter her creature, under the Title of Richard Plantagenet, ſecond Sonne of King Edward the fourth; ſhe moſt covertly ſends him into Portugall, from thence to take his Icarean flight, as * elſe-where is related. Nevertheleſſe, there will not (perhaps) want ſome, who in defence of the Dutcheſſe, had rather referre it to Magnanimity, and Nobleneſſe of Spirit, in ſeeking the honour of her houſe; which, if it might paſſe for ſuch among the Heathen, yet can it not among Chriſtians; much the leſſe, for that her dutie to England, and the royall flouriſhing eſtate of her owne Neece, the right heire, exacted at her hands a greater tenderneſſe.

(34) That Peter Warbecke ſhould bee inflamed by her favours, and encouragements, to dare in earneſt the perſonation of a Kings ſonne, ſeemes not a thing to be admired; for there is in humane nature (which tyes not her ſelfe to Pedigrees, nor Parentages) a kinde of light matter, which will eaſily kindle, being touch't with the blazing hopes of ambitious propoſitions. He therefore upon the firſt diſcloſe of * himſelfe, did put on ſo excellent a ſeeming as might juſtly moove King Henry to be jealous, whereunto the pernitious practiſe might come at laſt; for there wanted nothing in the whole forme of the young up-ſtart, but onely the conſcience of a truth, and truth it ſelfe: which makes mee call to minde * what one hath written of a goodly white Saphyr in Venice, made by Art ſo neerely to reſemble a true Diamond, that with much difficultie, and but by one onely lapidary, it was diſcovered; which if it had beene graced with ſome great Princes wearing, what could want to have made it paſſable for a very Diamond of greateſt value? Perkin came ſuch from out of the Burgundian forge; and (if his parentage be reſpected) aſſumed the image and reſemblance of a King, being otherwiſe not ſo much as a meane Gentleman. Neither can it be marvelled at, if ſuch a Phantaſme as this, did abuſe, and trouble the common people of that time; for even to ſuch as doe write thereof, it begets a kinde of doubt (which without ſome little collection of their ſpirits doth not eaſily vaniſh,) it ſeeming almoſt incredible, that ſuch a bloudy play ſhould meerely be diſguiſed and fained; the diſcovery therefore was worthy ſuch a wit as King Henries, and the puſh it gave to his ſoveraignty did throughly try his fitting, being of force enough to have caſt an ordinary rider out of ſaddle.

(35) Therefore, it was the Dutcheſſes miſfortune, that her inventions (if they were hers) had to encounter ſo politique and conſtant a man as King Henry; whoſe prudence ſearcht into the abſtruſeſt ſecrets, and whoſe diligence over-came all difficulties. Yet the Lady Margarets courſe to vent her Creature at the firſt was exquiſite; for ſhee (as in a Magicke practiſe) having kept him ſecret till ſhee ſaw her time, cauſeth him to be cloſely convayed into * Portugall; from whence (attended with fit aſſociates and Privadoes) he ſayles into Ireland (the Foſter-place and nurſery of immortall good will to the houſe of Yorke) where (notwithſtanding their late calamities,) he ſo ſtrongly enchanted that rude people with the charmes of falſe hopes, and miſts of ſeemings, as he was ſure of partakers in great plentie. Charles the eight, King of France, hearing (and perhaps beleeving) that the Duke of Yorke was alive, and glad to have ſo probable an occaſion of doing miſchiefe to Henry of England, in regard of theſe flagrant enmities which as then remained unquencht betweene them, invites Duke Richard moſt officiouſly to Paris, and beſides all other honours, aſſigned him (at his comming) a guard for his perſon, whereof the Lord Congreſhall was Captaine. Afterward there repayred to this new Duke, Sir George Nevill Knight, (a * baſtard of the noble houſe of the Nevils,) Sir John Taylor, Rowland Robinſon, and about an hundreth Engliſh, to whom (as a principall) we may adde * Stephen Frion, French Secretary to King Henry himſelfe; all which, together with the whole Stratageme, was ſmoakt out of France with the firſt graine of Incenſe ſacrificed upon the Altars of Peace at Boloigne, after the ſame was once made and ratified (as you have heard) betweene the French and us. The Dutcheſſe then ſeeing her artificiall creature thus turned againe upon her hands, pretends an extreame ignorance that ever ſhee had ſeene him before that preſent, and an exceſſive joy for his miraculous eſcape, and preſervation, which ſeemed ſuch to her as ſhe pretended) as if hee had beene revived from death to life, and that the fable might want no quickning, wᵗʰ her perſonal countenancing, or her Court could afford, ſhe openly ſalutes him by the delicate Title of the * White Roſe of England, and queſtions him of the manner of his eſcape, with ſuch like, to beget a firme beliefe in the hearers, that ſhee never had ſeene him before that time, and that he was indeed her Nephew Richard Duke of Yorke. The Nobility of Flanders accordingly, doe unto him all honour, and ſhee environs his perſon with a guard of thirtie men in murrey and blew. Neither was hee in any point wanting to his part; but fitted ſuch likely anſwers to all queſtions, and ſuch princely behaviours to all occaſions, as made fame bold to publiſh him with the fulleſt blaſt of her Trumpet, for no other then a true Richard Plantagenet; and as it is ſo obſerved of ſome, that by long uſing to report an untruth, at laſt forgetting themſelves to be the Authors thereof, beleeve it in earneſt; ſo theſe honours making our Peter to bury in utter oblivion his births obſcuritie, hee ſeemed to be perſwaded, that he was indeed the ſelfe partie, whom hee did ſo exactly perſonate. Noveltie, and impudencie were fcarce ever knowne to have found more applauſe, or beliefe, even among many very wiſe, and (otherwiſe) worthy men; who moved in conſcience, and not onely upon diſcontent, inclined to partake with this new Plantagenet, as the only right heire of the Engliſh Diadem, as if, whether he had beene the true one, it was paſt diſpute. This intoxication, and abuſion of the world, was wonderfully encreaſed by the ſecret revolt of Sir Robert Clifford Knight, whom (as one that had ſeene, and knowne the true Richard) the cunning conſpirators in England had ſent over, to informe himſelfe, and them, whether he was indeed as he ſeemed. Sir Robert (whoſe preſence and errand were to the Dutcheſſe moſt welcome,) being brought to his ſight, did forthwith give credite, and conſtantly ſignifie, that this was indeed Richard Plantagenet, the true Duke of Yorke, and that he well knew him for ſuch. Money and encouragements, were hereupon ſent out of England, from ſuch as favoured him, among whom was * Sir William Stanley Lord Chamberlain to King Henry (by whoſe punctuall revolt from K. Richard, he had principally atchieved the Crowne of England) * John Ratcliffe, L. Fitzwalter, * Sir Simon Montfort, Sir Thomas Thwates Knights, and others; but the maine countenance of the cauſe in foraine parts was Sir Robert Clifford (a Knight of an honourable fame and Family) which moved the ſecret friends of the new Duke to ſet the rumour ſo cunningly on foot among the Engliſh, that * ſooner might a cloud, which cauſeth thunder, be caught or knowne, then the Author thereof; and multitudes being weakened therewith, ſtore of humor

(36) For prevention therefore of all thoſe effects which might riſue out of theſe cauſes, (being in their proper nature moſt generative of fedition, and of all ſorts of civill furies) King Henry diligently cauſeth the coaſts of England to be well and ſtrongly watcht, aſwell to empeach the landing of enemies, as the eſcape of fugitives: but above all, hee writes letters to his beſt friends in foraigne parts, & alſo employes nimble wits with ſeverall inſtructions; ſome to aſſaile the conſtancy of Sir Robert Clifford, (the maine ſtay and credite of Perkins cauſe) with promiſe of immunity and favour if hee would returne into England in quiet; others, to finde out the truth of Perkins quality, being furniſhed with treaſure to draw and requite intelligences; and all of them (as occaſion ſhould ſerve) to pretend themſelves vehement favorers of the new Duke. Theſe neceſſary hypocrites and double-faced Ambidexters, called Spies, (whoſe ſervices, howſoever conducible to ſuch as ſets them on worke, yet their perfidious quality commonly partakes with that of Iudas Iſcariot, and often meetes with like reward,) doe plye their charge ſo roundly that * Sir Robert Clifford is ſecretly drawne off, the new Duke is diſcovered aſwell by them, as by * ſundry letters from friends abroad, to bee but Perkin Warbecke, and many other myſteries are revealed. This gave to the wiſe King great ſatisfaction, who to weaken the enemies practiſe the more, not onely divulgeth the fraud, but ſends over-ſea Sir William Poyninge Knight, and Sir William Warham his Ambaſſadors to the Arch-Duke Philip Duke of Burgundy (then governed by others by reaſon of his tender age) who promiſed not to aſſiſt the ſaid Perkin, but if the Dutcheſſe Dowager would doe any ſuch thing, to the prejudice of King Henry, it was not in him to hinder her, for that ſhe might diſpoſe of her owne. A maine argument uſed by theſe Ambaſſadors before the Arch-Dukes Counſell to convince, that Richard the very Duke of Yorke was murthered as well as King Edward his Brother German, as Polydor (who ſeemes to have had good meanes to underſtand theſe times) reheareth it, was, That their Vncle Richard ſhould in vaine have made away the elder Brother, if the younger had beene ſuffered to ſurvive, for that the right of the elder, was immediately upon his death in the younger, and that conſequently during his life, King Richard could have no more aſſurance, then if the elder were ſtill alive: which Argument notwithſtanding doth at moſt proove nothing but this: That their Vncle the Vſurper might intend, that both his Nephewes ſhould bee murthered, and that hee knew nothing perhaps to the contrary. Whereas facts are to be proved by confeſſions of parties, by witneſſes, or vehement preſumptions, (though vehement preſumptions are ſaid to conſtitute but an halfe proofe) al which are * otherwhere ſo ſupplyed, as leaves ſmal cauſe to doubt of both their deaths. But Warham (a learned Prieſt and Doctor in the Lawes) the mouth of that Ambaſſage ſent to the Arch-Duke, in the end of his oration uſed this bitter ſcoffe and Sarcaſme againſt the Lady Margaret: *That ſhee in her old age brought forth two Monſters within the ſpace of a few yeeres, and both of them not in the eight, or ninth moneth after their conception, as naturall mothers, but in the one * hundred and eightieth moneth; and where as other women brought forth Infants utterly unable to helpe themſelves, theſe births of hers were tall ſtriplings, and as ſoone as they were borne, offered battell unto mighty Kings.* And albeit the Arch-Dukes anſwer ſeemed reaſonable, yet was not King Henry ſo ſatisfied, but that within a while after, for * that the Arch-Duke had ſecretly furniſht Perkin with leaders, he tooke occaſion to baniſh all Flemings, and Flemiſh wares out of his Dominions, and inhibited his Subjects to trade in any Countries within the obedience of Maximilian King of Romans, or of the Arch-Duke Philip his Sonne, who by way of talio and requitall did the like againſt the Engliſh.

* Stowes Annal. Polydor calls him but a Knight.

King Henry executes S. Robert Clifford in the Tower of London.

(37) Let us come now from the addreſſes of things, to their doing. The high prudence and induſtry of Henry having thus diſcovered the foundations of Perkins hopes in England, and the humours which were moſt unſound, made it his firſt worke to raze thoſe ground-workes, and purge the vaines of his Realme from that corruption by needfull Phleborotomy. The * Lord Fitzwalter, a principall conſpirator, being condemned, and ſent to Calis, lived there in hope of pardon; but for practiſing with his Keepers to eſcape, hee finally payed his head for ſatisfaction. Sir Simon Montfort, Robert Ratcliffe, and William Dawbeney (Gentlemen of Noble houſes) as Captaines and Authors of the Conſpiracy, were beheaded, but al the reſt, aſwell Clerks as Lay-men, had their pardons. Not long after theſe executions and pardons, the King upon ſure intelligence that Sir Robert Clifford (in whoſe boſome the ſecret of all Perkins plot lay) was arrived, entred the Tower of London, and there continued; that ſo, if Clifford ſhould accuſe any of the great, (and whom hee then would accuſe, it is probable King Henry knew) they might without ſuſpition, or tumult, be attached; the Court, and publike priſon for crimes of higheſt nature, being then within the cincture of one and the ſame wall. Sir Robert Clifford at his comming into the Kings preſence, (though he was ſecretly before aſſured of his life) moſt humbly praying and obtaining pardon, appeached (among many others) Sir William Stanley Lord Chamberlaine. The King would not at firſt give credite (or at leaſt-wiſe pretended not to give credit) to the accuſation of a Peere ſo great, and ſo neere unto him; but upon farther ſearch, finding the ſame confirmed with circumſtances, and particularly, for that ne ſaid to Clifford, * He would never beare Armes againſt the yong man, if hee knew him for certaine to bee the Sonne of King Edward, he reſolveth to uſe ſeverity againſt the delinquent.

Sir William Stanley Lord Chamberlaine accuſed.

(38) But Bernard Andreas directly ſaith, That (beſides bare words and purpoſes) Sir William had ſupported Perkins cauſe with treaſure, wherein hee is recorded ſo to have abounded, as that in his Caſtle of * Holt he had in coyne and plate to the value of forty thouſand Markes, beſides Lands of inheritance in ſundry places about, to the yearely value of three thouſand pounds (a pretty ſtocke in treaſure at thoſe times, to uphold the firſt brunt of a Warre, and a large extent of Land to furniſh the wing of a powerfull Battell, with able Souldiers out of Tenancies) with all which the ſame Author in plaine words, ſaith, That hee promiſed to defend the ſaid Pretender, and bring him into the Kingdome. And if we have any in-ſight into King Henries diſpoſition, it ſeemes to us, that before hee entred into the Tower, he not only knew the Lord Chamberlaine un-found, but alſo that for his quiet apprehenſion hee chiefely repaired thither. Stanley being hereupon attached, and referred to farther examination, is ſaid, * To have denyed nothing of all that wherewith he was charged, which hee perhaps the more confidently did, in hope that King Henry would pardon him, in reſpect of paſſed ſervices, they (in their effects conſidered) being the greateſt whereof mortality is capable, preſervation of life, and gayning of a Kingdome: But the poore Gentleman found himſelfe farre deceived in his politicke Lord and Maſter, who (to teach mankinde thereby, how dangerous it is to make a King) was not unwilling to cut him off, as perſwading himſelfe, that thoſe ſervices proceeded of ambition, not of affection, or if of affection, the cauſe now ceaſing, the contrary effects might proove as pernicious, as the other had beene advantageous and availeable. The King was unwilling to diſpleaſe his Father-in-Law, Thomas Earle of Derby (Brother-German to Sir William Stanley) and did therefore for a while ſuſpend his judgement; but rigour finally prevailed, hee was at Weſtminſter openly arraigned, convicted, and afterward ward at the block on Tower-hill beheaded. In whose office Giles Lord Dawbeny a moſt faithfull and moderate man ſucceeded. This ſharpe juſtice exerciſed upon ſo eminent a perſon, was of great uſe in the ſtay of peoples minds through the Realme of England. But in Ireland they were not ſo ſetled, or reduced, but that for the better and fuller purging thereof, Henry Deny (a Monke of Langton Abbey) was ſent Lord Chancellour thither, with orders and directions, and Sir Edward Poynings Knight, with Souldiers; whoſe greateſt diligence and cares were not wanting, to puniſh ſuch as heretofore had ayded Perkin, or might hereafter. The Earle of Kildare Lord Deputy, falling into ſuſpition with Poynings, was by him apprehended, and ſent priſoner into England; where the King did not onely graciouſly heare and admit his defences, but alſo returned him with honour, and continuation of authority. In the meane time (the errour, or weakneſſe of the Burgundian Dutcheſſe and her Perkin, ſuffering their enemy in this ſort, to purvey for his owne ſecurity, and their depulſion) and King Henry for farther aſſurance of himſelfe makes a progreſſe into Lancaſhire, there to recreate with his Father in law the Earle, and the Counteſſe his Mother, where among all other his ſecret purpoſes, he throughly ſatisfied the Earle, both for the juſtice and neceſſity of Sir William Stanleys death.

(39) Theſe certainely, were perillous times to live in, and undoubtedly full of infinite jealouſies, and hypocriſies, nor unlike to thoſe lately paſſed, * Wherein there was nothing ſo plaine, and openly proved, but that yet for the common cuſtome of cloſe and covert dealing, men had it ever inwardly ſuſpect, as many wel-counterfeited jewels make the true ſuſpected: Theſe generall diſtruſts being among the ſtrange gradations, by which the incomprehenſible providence doth uſe to chaſtiſe inſolent Nations, and to make regular Princes, meere and abſolute. But the Dutcheſſe and her Perkin knowing all things as they paſſed in England, reſolve notwithſtanding to proceed; and therefore taking advantage of the Kings abſence in the North, hee with a force of broken and diſcontented perſons, ſets ſaile for England, and approcheth the coaſts of Kent about Sandwich and Deale, there to begin his enterprize for obtaining the Crowne of England, under the borrowed name and title of Richard Duke of Yorke, if he found the Commons forward. But they, though doubtfull at firſt what to doe, yet at the laſt conſidering that his Souldiers were for the moſt part of deſperate fortunes, and felonious quality, (though hardy otherwiſe, and approved men of warre,) remembring withall the miſchiefes of part-takings, would not adhere, but trayning them within danger upon promiſe of ſuccour, and aſſaile, drive them to their ſhippes, take five of their Captaines, Montford, Corbet, Whiteboll, Quintin, and Genin, and * one hundreth, ſixty foure others, which were all of them afterward executed. Perkin himſelfe who would not truſt his perſon on ſhore, being worthily troubled at the in auſpicious fortune of his followers, preſently hoiſed ſailes, and returned to his Lady Patroneſſe and Creatrix, into Flanders.

(40) Theſe newes being brought to the King, where he was then in the North, he is * ſaid to have given God thankes, and declared his joy in theſe words: I am not ignorant (moſt mercifull Ieſu) how great victories thou haſt given mee, upon the Saturday, at the prayers of thy moſt gracious Mother, all which I aſcribe not to my deſerts, but to the bounty of thy celeſtiall grace. Thou (ceſt, O moſt benigne Ieſu, how many ſnares, how many deceits, how many weapons, that terrible Iuno hath prepared, notwithſtanding that after my marriage, ſhee faining her ſelfe joyfull, hath faithfully promiſed to beare toward us all favour and good-will, but ſhe, more changeable then the wind, perverting all things, aſwell divine as humane, feares not God, but in her fury ſeekes the utter ruine of her owne bloud. Thou, Oh God, who knoweſt all, deliver us alſo (if wee ſeeme worthy) from theſe evils, but if our ſinnes have deſerved to ſuffer, doe thou, O Lord, thy good pleaſure. Neverthelеſſe, wee owe to thy Grace immortall thankes, which though with our tongue wee cannot utter worthily enough, yet muſt they bee rendred. Wee are alwayes of good courage, and ſo minded for certaine, that no proſperity, no adverſity, no chance, no diſtance of places, or times, ſhall once make us of thee unmindfull. The moſt modeſt King having ended his ſpeech, doth forth-with (ſaith our Author) ſeriouſly deliberate with his Councell what was to bee done hereafter. It may probably ſeeme, that hee had with drawne into the North, to invite Perkin (by occaſion of his abſence) the rather to take Land, that ſo hee might draw all his dangers into one place, and decide them in a Battell, if his Subjects ſhould revolt to Perkin in any numbers, or if they did not, then might hee fall into his hands, by landing unwarily upon truſt of the peoples favour, and ſo by a more compendious and eaſie way ſettle his Eſtate, of which he failed but little, by the ſaid counter-policy of the Kentiſhmen. In regard whereof, in the firſt Act of Councell, praiſe and thankes were decreed to them, with which firſt Sir Richard Gilford Knight was preſently ſent away, and order taken for the erection and watching of Beacons upon the Coaſts.

(41) The Dutcheſſe on the other ſide, ſeeing the South of England proove ſo dry, and barren to her drifts, conveighes againe her Idoll into Ireland, where ſhee well knew there could not want partakers; and Perkin himſelfe daring to entertaine the hope of a Crowne, (for by ſo long perſonation of a Kings Sonne, and heire, ambition had throughly kindled his youthfull bloud) was now no little cauſe of bringing things to an iſſue by his owne forwardneſſe. * Maximilian King of Romans, whether as one willing to keepe the Engliſh buſied (* Henry having forbidden his Subjects all traffique with the Flemmings, and all other of his Sonne the Archdukes Subjects,) or as crediting the fiction, and therefore led thereunto in honour and conſcience; * Charles alſo King of France, but ſpecially the Dutcheſſe of Burgundy, (by whom this bubble was firſt blowne up, and put abroad) did concurre to the makeſtation of King Henry; Maximilian, and the French King, more ſecretly, but the Dutcheſſe with all her Oares and Sailes plyed it in open view. Borne up by theſe ſupporters, he the rather eaſily drew the Iriſh to aſſent to his pretext; but his counſell weighing with themſelves that the Iriſh-mens friendſhip, how firme ſo ever, was inſufficient in reſpect of their nakedneſſe and poverty to worke their wiſhes, hee according to ſuch adviſes as were taken before his departure from his Creatrix, croſſeth into Scotland, for feare of puniſhment, faith * Andreas; if perhaps by the Kings true Subjects within Ireland hee ſhould chance to bee apprehended; but the event ſhewes, that it was not onely for his more ſecurity, but principally to ſtrengthen his enterprize with the Scottiſh ayde, whereof in thoſe dayes hee had ſmall reaſon to bee doubtfull; and his caſe was ſuch, that no third courſe was left unto him, but either to fight and conquer, or live branded with immortall infamy both of Cowardize and impoſture. Henry hearing theſe things, was not ſlacke to provide for his juſt defence, greatly carefull upon what coaſt this wandering cloud would at length diſſolve it ſelfe, in what effects ſoever; and therefore obſerved all his wayes with as much curioſity as was poſſible.

(42) Iames the fourth, a young Prince of great hope was at that time King of Scots, to whom this bold counterfeit (being ſpecially recommended, for the true Richard Duke of Yorke, by the * King of France, and undoubtedly much more by the Dutcheſſe of Burgundy,) repaires; and had moſt courteous entertainement, and audience, the effect vvhereof Andreas thus coucheth: That the King was finally deceived by errour, as moſt of other, though moſt prudent, Princes, had beene before. But the rare impendency of th the Lad, and that connexion which his diſtreſſes had with ſo many great Princes, deſerve not to be ſo ſlenderly overpaſſed. He therefore being in honourable manner accompanied, and brought to the preſence of King Iames, had words to this effect. That Edward the fourth, late King of England, leaving two ſonnes Edward and Richard Duke of Yorke, both very young, Edward the eldeſt ſucceeded their Father in the Crowne, by the name of King Edward the fift: that their Vncle Richard Duke of Glouceſter to obtaine the Kingdome, purpoſed to murther both, but the inſtrument employed by him to execute the execrable Tragedy, having cruelly ſlaine King Edward the eldeſt of the two, was mooved to ſave King Richard his Brother, whom nevertheleſſe the world ſuppoſed to have beene alike barbarouſly made away; though falſely ſuppoſed; for that himſelfe there preſent, was that very Richard Duke of Yorke, brother of that unfortunate Prince, King Edward the fift, now the moſt rightfull, and lineall ſurviving heire-Male to that victorious and moſt noble Edward of that name the fourth, late King of England. * That he in his tender age thus eſcaping by Gods mercy out of the Countie of London, was ſecretly conwayed over the Sea, * whither when hee was brought, the partie who had the conveiance of him in charge, ſuddenly for ſooke him, and thereby forced him to wander into * divers Countries, where hee remained certaine yeares as unknowne, * till at length he came to the true underſtanding of himſelfe. * In which ſeaſon it hapned one Henry, ſonne to Edmund Tydder Earle of Richmond, to come from France, and enter into the Realme, and by ſubtill and foule meanes, to obtaine the Crowne of the ſame, which to him the ſaid Richard rightfully appertained. That Henry as his extreame and mortall enemy, ſo ſoone as he had knowledge of his being alive, imagined, and wrought all the ſubtill waies and meanes he could, to deviſe his finall deſtruction. That the ſaid mortall enemy hath not only falſely furniſhed him to be a fained perſon, giving him nick-names; ſo abuſing the world, but that alſo, to deferre, and put him from entrie into England, hee hath offered large ſummes of money to corrupt the Princes, with whom he had beene retained, and made importune labour to certaine ſervants about his (the ſaid Richards) perſon, to murder or poiſon him, and others, to forſake and leave his righteous quarrell, and to depart from his ſervice, as Sir Robert Clifford, and others. That every man of reaſon may well underſtand, that the ſaid Henry needed not to have mooved the fore-ſaid Coſts, and importune labour, if hee had beene ſuch a fained perſon. That the truth of his cauſe ſo manifeſt * mooved the moſt Chriſtian King Charles, and the Lady, Dutcheſſe Dowager of Burgundy, his moſt deare Aunt, not onely to acknowledge the ſaid truth, but lovingly alſo to aſſiſt him. That now becauſe the Kings of Scotland (Predeceſſors of the ſaid King Iames) had oftentimes ſupported them, who were reſt and ſpoyled of the ſaid Kingdome of England, (as in freſheſt memory King Henry the ſixt,) and for that he (the ſaid King Iames) had given cleare ſignes, that he was in no noble qualitie, unlike to his royall Anceſtors, he, ſo diſtreſſed a Prince, was therefore mooved to come, and put himſelfe into his hands, deſiring his aſſiſtance to recover the Realme of England, promiſing faithfully, to beare himſelfe towards the ſaid Scottiſh King, no otherwiſe, then as if he had beene his owne naturall brother, and would (upon recovery of his inheritance) gratefully doe to him all the pleaſure which lay in his utmoſt power.

(43) Perkins ſpeech ended, and his amiable perſon being fitted with ſo many countenancing circumſtances of ſtate, and ſeemings, (by the recommendations of great Princes, ayde from the Iriſh, aſſured hope of ayde in England, and his owne well-appointed company,) made ſo ſtrong an impreſſion in the young Kings conceit, that, albeit there wanted not ſome, who with * many arguments adviſed the King to repute all but for a meere dreame, and illuſion, his perſon was honourably received, as it became the perſon of Richard Duke of Yorke, and in his quarrell entertained; which the more to grace in the Worlds eye, hee gave his conſent, that the ſaid Duke of Yorke ſhould take to wife the Lady Katherine Gordon, daughter to the Earle of Huntley, being neere Coſen to the King himſelfe, a young Maide of excellent beautie and vertue. By which marriage, as the gentle King abundantly declared, that he tooke him for the very Duke of Yorke, ſo Perkin, (diſtruſtfull of the Scots, * and deſirous to gaine the love and favour of the Nobles of the Realme) cunningly ſerved his owne ends for the preſent, paſſing current for a Prince of high bloud, and royall hope. Upon this ground a warre was preſently undertaken againſt Henry, and entred into; the King of Scots in perſon, and Perkin followed with great numbers, ſpecially of Borderers, fell upon ſundry parts of Northumberland, which they moſt grievouſly afflicted, burnt and ſpoyled, publiſhing nevertheleſſe by Proclamation made in the name of Richard Duke of Yorke, much favour and immunitie to all ſuch as would adhere to his juſt quarrell, and a * thouſand pounds in money, and one hundreth Markes by yeare of Land of inheritance to the meaneſt perſon, that could either take or diſtreſſe his great enemy who (he ſaid) was flying the land. But King Henry by his diligence, and wiſdome had ſo ſetled the minds of his people in thoſe parts, that there is no mention made of any one perſon which offered his ſervice. This unexpected averſion ſo blanket and dampt the Scottiſh enterprize on Perkins behalfe, that the King offended therewith, retired with his Army (laden with bootie) into his Realme, and from thenceforth eſteemed of his new Coſen the leſſe. But King Henry not minding to forgive ſo unjuſt and cauſeleſſe out-rages, calles a Parliament, opens his griefes, and prayes ayde for an invaſive warre againſt Scotland, which was generally aſſented unto, there being ſcarce any more gratefull propoſitions to the Engliſh in thoſe ſwording times, then warre with French or Scots: an humour, upon which this King did practiſe to enrich himſelfe. For the publike monies by theſe occaſions came into his Exchequer, with a ſmall part whereof he flouriſhed out a ſhow of hoſtile proviſions, and the Remainder thereupon (if peace enſued, which he alwaies knew how to bring about with honour) was clearely his owne without account. The ſumme aſſented to be gathered was * ſixeſcore thouſand pounds, and for collection thereof were granted two diſmes, and an halfe, and two fifteenes. But the levie of this money ſo granted in this Parliament, kindled a dangerous blaze in England; in ſo much, that the Lord Dawbeny being ſent Generall of the Forces againſt the Scots, and upon his way thither, was recalled by occaſion of inteſtine troubles.

(44) Which troubles had their Originall from the levie of ſuch payments among the Corniſh, as were aſſeſſed for the Scottiſh warres. When therefore the Collectors came among them, the People (being a ſtout, bigge, and hardy race of men,) tumultuouſly aſſembled; whom one Thomas * Flammocke a Lawyer, and Michael Ioſeph, a Blacke-ſmith or Horſe-Farrier of Bodnim, like firebrands of rebellion inflamed, and were followed as Captaines, not without ſecret and ſilent relation (as it may be ſuſpected) to Perkins pretences, and that hope of redreſſe (if he were King,) which, by his Proclamations he had colourably given to the people, at the time of the Scottiſh Invaſion; where, among many other things, (tending to humour ſuch as were malevolent, by making the perſon and government of King Henry odious,) this we finde.

(45) Our great enemy (faith the Proclamation) to fortifie his falſe quarrell, hath cauſed divers Nobles of this our Realme, whome he held ſuſpect, and ſtood in dread of, to be cruelly murdered: as our Coſen Sir William Stanley Lord Chamberlaine, Sir Simond Montford, Sir Robert Ratcliffe, William Daubeney, Humfrey Stafford,

Stafford, and many other, besides such as have deerely bought their lives, some of which Nobles are now in the Sanctuary. Also he hath long kept, and yet keepeth in prison our right intirely well-beloved Cosen, Edward, sonne and heire to our Vncle Duke of Clarence, and other, with-holding from them their rightfull inheritance, to the intent they should never bee of might and power, to aide and assist us at our need, after the dutie of their leageances. Hee hath also married, by compulsion, certaine of our Sisters, and also the Sister of our foresaid Cosen, the Earle of Warwicke, and divers other Ladies of the blood-Royall, unto certaine his kinsemen and friends, of simple and low degree; and putting apart all well-disposed Nobles, hee hath none in favour, and trust about his person, but Bishop Foxe, Smith, Bray, Lovell, Oliver King, Sir Charles Sommerset, Davy Owen, Rysly, Sir John Torbarvile, Tyler, Chamley, James Hobert, John Cut, Garth, Henry Wyot, and such other Caitives, and villaines of birth: which by subtill invencions, and pilling of the people, have beene the princi-pall finders, occasioners, and counsellers of the mis-rule and mischiefe now raigning in England, &c. We remembring these premisses, with the great, and execrable offences daily committed and done by our foresaid great enemy, and his Adherents, in breaking the liberties, and franchises of our mother, the holy Church; to the high displeasure of Almightie God: besides the manifold treasons, abominable murders, man-slaughters, robberies, extortions, the daily pilling of the people, by dismes, taskes, tallages, benevolences, and other unlawfull impositions, and grievous exactions, with many other hainous effects, to the likely destruction and desolation of the whole Realme, &c. shall by Gods grace, and the helpe, and assistance of the great Lords of our bloud, with the Counsell of other sad persons, &c. see that the commodities of our Realme be employed to the most advantage of the same, the entercourse of Merchandize betwixt Realme and Realme, to be ministred and handled, as shall more be to the Common-weale, and profit of our subjects: and all such dismes, taskes, tallages, benevolences, unlawfull impositions, and grievous exactions as be above rehearsed, to be fore-done, and laid apart, and never from henceforth to be called upon, but in such causes as our Noble Progenitors, Kings of England, have of old time beene accustomed to have the aide, succour, and helpe of their subjects, and true liegemen.

Popular insinuations by Perkin.

(46) The tide of people being thus up: Flammock and the Blacke-Smith (having firme promise of the Lord Audleys personall help) lead them forth toward Kent, where they doubted not greatly to encrease their numbers; and had in likelihood so done, but that the singular diligence and wisdome of the King, frustrated their hopes by sundry Princely Acts. Yet they flow on; and to shew what they durst doe, they slew in their way at Tamford, the Provost of Perin, one of the Commissioners for the Subsidie; and marching forward, without offering other violence, James Tuchet Lord Audley joynes himselfe at the Citie of Wells unto them, according to secret agreement, and becomes their Generall. From Wells they proceed to Salisbury, thence to Winchester, and so toward Kent, where the Countrey was setled and provided. But the King farther doubting that the Scots would take fresh occasion, by these seditious uproares, to invade the borders of his Realme, dispatched Thomas Howard Earle of Surrey (* a Peere of excellent vertue) to defend those parts, with the helpe of the Bishopricke of Durham, and the Marches, till these homecommotions were appeased; that then the Lord Dawbeny might with a just and full Army prosecute the warre against the Scots. But James their King, perceiving the end of the English intestine warres, would be the beginning of his troubles, thought it best by way of anticipation to weaken his enemy before hand as much as he could, and thereupon fiercely invaded Northumberland againe, and * besieged Norham Castle belonging to Richard Fox, whom the King for his noble services and deserts, and now advanced from Exceter, and Bathe and Wells, unto the Bishopricke of Durham. But the Scottish King, hopelesse to winne the Castle, though having done much hurt both to it and to the Countrey, withdrew his people before the Earle of Surrey could approach with his Army, wherein was the Earle of Westmerland, the Lords, Dacres, Strange, Nevill, Latimer, Lumley, Scrope, Clifford, Conyers, Darcy, the Baron of Hilton, and many Knights, as Percie, Bulmer, Gasgoigne, Penington, Bigot, Bowes, Elarker, Parr, Wharton, Strangwith, Constable, Ratcliffe, Savile, Gower, Musgrave, Mallerie, Loder, Everingham, Stapleton, Worsley, Pickering, Hiron, Gray, Ridley, Griffith, Fenwicke, Ward, Strycland, Billingham, Curwen, Warcop, Tempest, Metcalfe, and others; who missing the enemy, marched after into Scotland, and tooke such revenge as the shortnesse of their sodaine provisions would enable.

(47) The Rebels on the other side, (whom King Henry thought not good to encounter in their first heates; but suffered them to tyre their furie, and furbate themselves with a long march, the Countries as they past being fore-laid from joyning with them) comming neere to Kent, found few, or no partakers there; but the Countrey strongly defended against them by the Earle thereof, the Lords Aburgeny and Cobham, with other principall men and their followers; which made divers of the Rebels fiercely shrinke and abandon the enterprise. But the Lord Audley, Flammocke, Michael Ioseph, and the rest, kept on their way, and encamped upon Blacke-heath, betweene Greenwich and Eltham, from the top whereof they might behold the City of London, and the whole bravery of that Horizon. Here they resolve to abide the King, or to assaile London. The King on the other side, by the diligence of the Lord Major, and other the magistrates, secured the City, which was full of feare and businesse; himselfe enuironed with his Nobles, and the choyse of the South, hearing where the Rebell was encamped, resolved by dint of Sword to deliuer his people from tiring expectations, and for that purpose marcheth out of London, and encamps in S. Georges field, where hee * lay that night. The next day, when hee vnderstood that the Enemy had drawne forth his people, and set them in battell-ray, he sends out Henry Bourchier Earle of Essex, Edmond de la Pole Earle of Suffolke, Sir Rice ap Thomas, and others, with certaine Corners of Horse, and Companies of Archers, to beset the hill, and the descents thereof, while Giles Lord Dawbeny with the strength of his Army, chargeth the Enemy in Front, whom with some slaughter they drave from the Bridge at Deepford strand; and then mounting the hill, he and the Earles charge the maine squadrons on all sides, and without much labour breake and defeate them. The number of the Rebels slaine is uncertainly reported, the ods being betweene * two thousand and * three hundreth. The Kings army returned fewer by three hundreth. Fifteene hundreth rebels were taken Prisoners, and the takers had their Prisoners goods granted them. James Lord Audley, Flammocke, and the Smith were taken, and executed. To all the rest mercy was seasonably extended. The Lord Audley led from Newgate to Tower-hill in a Coate of his owne Armories painted on a paper, reverst and torne, there paid his head, for being a Head to that heady Route: Flammocke and the Smith were quartered. Memorably * strange was the comfort, with which this Blacksmith is said to have cheered up himselfe at his being drawne to execution, saying, That yet he hoped thereby, that his Name and Memory should be everlasting. Who could beleeve that the desire of a long-lasting name, how soever, should take the affections of so meane a person? Such therefore was the end of this insurrection; but the times being queasie, the King wisely forbare to take any severe revenge upon more then onely upon the chiefe Leaders, for hee was truly informed that this calamitie had not broken the wils of the Cornishmen, who remained ready ready for any desperate sudden occasion, and therefore he abstained from needlesse exasperations, insomuch as that the quarters of Flammocke, and the Smith being once appointed to have beene set up in Cornwall for terror, were onely fixed about London, the King thinking good to temper his justice even in such a circumstance.

Heestirred, from Stowes Ann.

(48) His next care was so to order the warre against Scotland, that the Peace, whose foundations he had laid a farre off, might be made to his more honor: and because the injuries sustained by the youthfull errour of King Iames, were too publike to be altogether forgotten; hee sent the Earle of Surrey, the Lord Nevill, and others, to invade the Scottish borders with an Army, who pursued the revenge with great vehemency. Meane-while there arriveth in Scotland Peter Hyalus an Ambassadour from Ferdinando and Elizabeth, King and Queene of Spaine, as from friends equally well affected to both parties, to mediate a peace betweene the two Kings of England, and Scotland, which perhaps in their owne persons would not easily have beene brought about, the poynt of honour might thereunto have given such Impeachment. But this was the way to a peace which King Henry fore-saw, there being not onely a strict bond of love betweene him, and Ferdinando, but an overture, if not a * secret conclusion, to match his eldest Sonne Prince Arthur with the young Lady Katherine daughter of Spaine, who for her excellent vertues was well worthy to be the happy wife of any Prince then breathing. Hyalus so handled the poynt of his employment, that an honourable truce followed. This Ambassadour was a practicke man, of much experience, and knew the better how to deale on the behalfe of King Henry against Perken Warbecke (* an imaginary and Stage-play Prince) for that his Soveraigne Queene had also beene exceedingly molested by a Counterfeit. For Henry the fourth King of Castile, and brother to Elizabeth, being unable to beget Children, Ioan (Daughter of Edward King of Portugall) his wife found meanes notwithstanding to beare one, by occasion whereof, after King Henries death, for that it was borne in marriage, a dangerous warre was undertaken by * Alfonso King of Portugall, on behalfe of Isabel the supposed inheritrix; but Truth, partly by force, and partly by mediation, was in the end victorious; and Elizabeth, or Isabella sister of Henry succeeded to her brother, and brought the inheritance of the Kingdomes of Castile and Leon, with her to Ferdinand King of Arragon. The chiefe point of this truce with Scotland was, That Perken Warbecke should leave that Kingdome, seeing King Iames, standing upon his honour, would not deliver him up to King Henry. Perken having now no remedy, did accordingly, taking with him his Wife, the Lady Katherine Gordon; and with such few as remained to him, past into Ireland, wheere hee had not continued long, but the Cornish-men offer to rise at his arrivall, and to adventure their fortunes and lives in his quarrell: Which motion Perken gladly entertained, as perceiving yet some little hope left to maintaine himselfe, by the troubles and hazards of others: but the policy and fortune of King Henry were growne so venerable with the Princes his Neighbours, that Ambassadours came from Fraunce, and from the Arch Duke of Burgundy; the one to ratifie amity, the other to request the restitution thereof; both which K. Henry (who reposed his whole trust next under God, upon the amity of his neighbours) granted, and the English Merchants (who had beene somewhat long forbidden by their Soveraigne to trade in the Arch-Dukes Dominions) * returning to Antwerpe were received into the same with Procession: so that Perken could scarce cast his eye upon any place, not onely where to raise aydes, but not where to rest his head, unlesse perhappes in the Court of the Dutchesse of Burgundy; neither in all his fortunes did any thing seeme miserable or unworthy, but the great infelicity of his Wife, whose beauty, birth, and honourable qualities ought not to have beene so betrayed by her friends temerity. Perken hereupon landing at Whitsand Bay in Cornwall in September, found meanes afterward at Bodmin to raise some thousands of people, whom with most lavish promises, invective proclamations, and strong impudency, hee held together under the Title of Richard the fourth King of England, whose fate was none of the happiest, while the majesty of her name might so bee played with by impostors. Perken thus accompanied, marcheth toward the City of Exceter, purposing if hee could winne it by force, to enrich his Souldiers with the spoyles thereof, and to invite all other loose, or lost people to his service by the hope of like booties, and by taking into his possession such places of strength as lay in his way to secure his retreat, if (according to the ordinary fortune of warre) any thing should happen to him luckily.

The City of Exeter assaulted by Perkin.

(50) But the King (hearing that the Varlet was landed, and againe made head against him in Armes upon trust of the Cornish-mens assistance) is said to "have smiled, using these words; * Loe, we are againe "provoked by this Prince of Rakehells, but lest my peo-"ple should through ignorance be drawne into destru-"ction, let us seeke to take this Perken by the easiest "wayes we can. Reason he had to smile, for now hee seemed to see the bottome of his perill, and as it were to hold his enemy empounded within the English Ocean, it being a perpetuall and noble wish of his, that he might looke his dangers in the face, and deale with them hand to hand, as the neerest cut over to a full conclusion. He therefore provides accordingly, assembling his forces, and his wits (no lesse to bee dreaded then this forces) sending forth his espyals into all parts to observe the tracke, and hopes of this empty cloud, which is now seene before Exceter, a principall strength, and ornament of the Westerne parts of the Kindome. Parlees, and the allurements of words under the guilt title of King Edwards Sonne, proving unavaileable with those resolute and faithfull Citizens; Perken forthwith betakes himselfe to violence, sets fire on the gates, mounts his scaling Ladders against the walls, and with his utmost fury labours to force a suddaine entrance, for that as hee suspected, succours could not long bee wanting. The Citizens on the other side, and such of the Country as came in, prepare, and make a very valiant defence against the Rebell, and instead of quenching the fires kindled by the enemy at the gates, to open a passage (for they had not Canon, or any other Ordonance) the Citizens threw on great store of fagots and fuell, and so with flame did shut up the way, when the gates themselves were now consumed; and in the meane-while they cast up trenches, and man their walles, from whence, with the slaughter of about two hundred Rebels at this assaule, they valiantly drave them. Such messengers as by cords slipt downe the walls, to signifie their perill, sped toward the King; but the loyall diligence of * Edward Courtney Earle of Devonshire, the Lord William his Sonne, with many principall Gentlemen of those parts, as Trenchard, Carew, Fulford, Halewell, Croker, Edgecombe, Semar, followed with great store of Souldiers, saved him the labour of a personall rescue by timely approach.

Perken sits Taunton

(51) Perken hearing thereof, riseth from before Exceter, and marcheth to Taunton (agoodly towne not farre off) there to take the musters of his Army, and to provide for encounter, where he found very many blanks in the list of his numbers, for that they had secretly shrunke away, as misdoubting the sequell, the Earle of Devonshire being so neere at hand with the power of the Country, and the King upon his way against them, with the majesty and terrour of a royall name, and Army, none of the Nobility (which was chiefly hoped) comming to their aide, Perken nevertheleſſe makes ſhew of ſtanding, with ſuch as were left unto him. The Earle of Devonſhire marching towards Taunton, in the way there came unto him Edward Duke of Buckingham, a * young Lord, full of great honour and courage, followed by a goodly troupe of Knights, and others excellently well appointed, both for their own perſons, and their peoples. Theſe we finde named as principall; Bridges, Bainham, Barkley, Tame, Wiſe, Poyntz, Vernon, Mortimer, Tremail, Sutton, Paulet, Bricknell, Sapcott, Lutterell, Wadham, Specke, Beauchamp, Cheney, Tokett, Long, Latimer, Turbervile, Stourton, Newbrough, Martin, Lynde, Rogers, Hungerford, Semar, Darrell, Barow, Norris, Langford, Corbet, Blunt, Lacon, Cornwall; and many other prime and valiant men of Armes. The King laſt of all (to permit as little to fortune as was poſſible) ſent Robert Lord Brooke, Giles Lord Dawbeney, and that renowned and truſty Welſhman Sir Rice ap Thomas, with the marrow and ſtrength of his Army before, himſelfe following in perſon with ſuch as hee thought good. Neither was his care cauſeleſſe, for the Corniſhmen were come to that height of deſperate obſtinacy and malice, * as not one of them but reſolved to conquer, or to leave his carkaſe in the place. But God loved him and them better, then to ſuffer it to come ſo farre; for Perken, whether fearing treaſon in his owne Army, or otherwiſe touch't with the conſcience of his quality, and damnable eſtate of the quarrell, wherein it was horrible to die, having in his troupe but threeſcore horſe, ſecretly fled from the ſeduced Commons. Which when the King heard, hee preſently ſets out five hundreth horſe to purſue and apprehend him, before he ſhould get to the Sea, and ſo eſcape. Perken and his remaines thus ſtreightned, tooke Sanctuary at Beaulieu, a religious houſe within New Forreſt, (not farre from Hampton) where the Kings Cornets of horſe found them already regiſtred; but according to inſtructions they beſet the place, and maintaine a ſtrong watch about it day and night. The other Rebels the while without ſtroke ſtricken, humbled themſelves to their Soveraignes mercy, and found it in undeſerved meaſure. Other ſtrong troupes of Horſe are at the ſame inſtant diſpatched to Saint Michaels Mount in Cornwall, where the beautifull Lady Katherine Gordon had beene left by her lewde Husband. Her without reſiſtance they brought ſafely to the King, whoſe beauty the whole Court praiſed, and pitied; but the King moſt gratiouſly comforting her, ſent her away well attended to the Queene his Wife, and for her births-ſake allowed her * maintenance, which in honourable manner ſupported her during the Kings life and many yeares after. Her faireneſſe was ſuch, and her preſence ſo amiable, that ſhee deſerved to bee commonly called The White Roſe; whoſe fortunes (being ſo farre unworthy either of her birth, her ſingular modeſty, or Wively faith, notwithſtanding the ſo abject condition of her Husband) as they moved juſt commiſeration toward her, ſo they doubled the luſtre of her praiſes.

(52) In the mean-while the King makes a rejoyceſull entrance into Exceſter, to teſtifie his princely love to the Citizens, whom hee highly commended and graced, both for their courage and loyalty; commanding ſome of the Corniſh Rebels to be executed there, which did the better ſet off the others contrary condition. There alſo hee gave directions, to offer life, and oblivion of all crimes to Perken, if he would voluntarily quit the Sanctuary, and ſubmit himſelfe. Perken being now without hope, without abode, without eſtate, moſt gladly came forth, and did put himſelfe into the Kings hands, Reaſons leading that wiſe Prince to extend this favour, were drawne out of the depth of true judgement, cleared from vulgar perturbations: firſt, it was not altogether impoſſible, but that Perken might eſcape him, (though by offering ſelfe-violence) and ſo the world ſhould looſe the light of ſatisfaction in ſo profound and perhaps a matchleſſe impoſture; then againes his youth might merite ſome compaſſion; but the infinite deſire which Henry had, from the mouth of the party himſelfe, to learne all the ſecrets of the plot, and who they were that lay undiſcovered, and yet had finger in the myſticall practiſe, moved him to affect the poſſeſſion of his perſon alive; which now hee had. Thus was this ſo dreaded a blaze of Rebellion ſuddainely and finally quenched; but not without the teares of many in Devon and Sommerſetſhire, whoſe eſtates the Kings Officers ſqueazed and drained, in revenge of their partaking, and ſupporting the Corniſh-Rebels, either in the field, or flight. Henry having Perken in his power, gave way to all ſuch ſcornes and ſcoffes, which his Courtiers or others were pleaſed to paſſe upon him, the more to make his perſon contemptible, who well-watched, followed the King to London, whither as he progreſſed, multitudes flockt about to behold the Captiſe, * Who being a ſtranger, nor any way (whatſoever hee boaſted to the contrary) deſcended of Nobles, had dared to trouble ſo great a Kingdome, and by his craftie convoiances had induced ſo many Princes and Nations (not without miſchiefe and ruine unto divers) to believe of him, that which he never was. And that he might in no part be unknowne, he is leaſurely conveied on horſebacke from the furtheſt part of * London, through Cheapſide and Cornehill to the Tower, and backe from thence through Canning-ſtreet to Weſtminſter, as the ſubject of wonderment, and of all reproach and infamies. The King having in this ſort taken revenge of his ſo ſtrange an enemy, and by curious and often examination comming to the full knowledge of that his ſoule deſired, did ſet ſuch to attend, as never went an inch from Perkens ſight, (though he ſeemed to goe at liberty) left through the ſlippery Arts of his tempting ſpeech and behaviour, he might vaniſh into forraigne parts, and raiſe freſh ſtormes in England, and bring new comfort to the Lady Margaret Dutcheſſe of Burgundy, the ſinneſull countenance of all this curſed Serataggeme, whoſe heart was now almoſt riven in ſunder with the newes of her Perkens moſt hideous ſhame and miſery; the whole bluſhing tenour whereof might eaſily come to her hands at once; for Henry cauſed ſo much of the principall matter, as Perken had confeſſed, to bee * committed to the Printing Preſſe; (an Art then firſt appearing among us,) and publiſhed. None can juſtly wonder, that wee have dwelt ſo long in this wonderfull Story, but rather perhaps wiſh that more particularities (though with more prolixity) had bin uſed. And though ſome other Actions as * Sebaſtian Cabots diſcovery, and overtures of marriages with Spaine and Scotland, came betweene this apprehenſion, and the execution of Perken, yet have we thought it beſt, (the ſooner, and at once to rid our hands of a * knave, as King Henry juſtly called him) to couch all that which concernes him here together, not fearing to incurre among the learned, the taxation of committing therein contradiction, and confuſion of times.

(53) Perken being thus guarded, doth notwithſtanding attempt to eſcape. And if it were lawfull to inſert particular conjectures, drawne out of the conſiderations of circumſtances, we ſhould perhaps not ſpare to ſay, that his attempt for eſcape, was not without the Kings privity; uſing ſuch inſtruments to perſwade, or furniſh his flight, as might withall betray him, that ſo by degrees (occaſion taken to cut him off) the Realme might be ridde from ſuch perpetuall matter of trouble. For the depraved wit and will of man might finde or faine reaſons to abuſe the world ſtill, if Perken were at liberty; as that the confeſſions were extorted by feare, or forged by Henry to ſerve his turne, and the like. Therefore Perkens intention and eſcape (for hee was eſcaped) being diſcovered to the King, all the wayes were beſet, and he ſo cloſe purſued, that in the end betaking himſelfe to a religious houſe of Carthuſian Monkes, hee declared who

But for a ſcale and totall ſumme of all ignominy and ſhame (ſuch as no face did ever beare greater) he read his owne confeſſion, written with his owne hand, * as followeth.

(54) It is firſt to be knowne, that I was borne in the Towne of Tourney in Flanders, and my Fathers name is Iohn Oſbecke, which ſaid John Oſbecke was controller of the ſaid Towne of Tourney, and my Mothers name is Katherine de Faro. And one of my Grandfires upon my Fathers ſide was named Diricke Oſbecke, which dyed. After whoſe death my Grandmother was married unto Peter Flamin, that was receiver of the fore-named Towne of Tourney, and Deane of the Boremen, that row upon the water or River called Le Scheld. And my Grandfire upon my Mothers ſide was Peter de Faro, which had in his keeping the keyes of the gate of Saint Iohns, within the ſame Towne of Tourney. Alſo I had an Vncle called Maſter Iohn Stalin, dwelling in the Pariſh of Saint Piaz, within the ſame Towne, which had married my Fathers ſiſter, whoſe name was Ione or Iane, with-whom I dwelt a certaine ſeaſon.

(55) And after I was led by my Mother to Antwerpe for to learne Flemiſh, in a houſe of a Coſin of mine, an officer of the ſaid Towne, called John Stienbecke, with whom I was the ſpace of halfe a yeare; and after that I returned againe to Tourney, by reaſon of warres that were in Flanders: and within a yeare following, I was ſent with a Merchant of the ſaid Towne of Tourney named Berlo, to the Mart of Antwerpe, where I fell ſicke, which ſickneſſe continued upon me five moneths. And the ſaid Berlo ſet mee to boord in a Skinners houſe, that dwelled beſide the houſe of the Engliſh Nation. And by him I was from thence carried to Barow Mart, and I lodged at the ſigne of the olde Man, where I abode for the ſpace of two moneths.

(56) After this, the ſaid Berlo ſet me with a Merchant of Middleborow to ſervice, for to learne the language, whoſe name was John Strew, with whom I dwelt from Chriſtmas to Eaſter, and then I went into Portugall in company of Sir Edward Bramptons Wife, in a ſhip was called the Queenes ſhippe. And when I was come thither, then was I put in ſervice to a Knight that dwelled in Liſboane, which was called Peter Vacz de Cogna, with-whom I dwelled an whole yeare, which ſaid Knight had but one eye. And becauſe I deſired to ſee other Countries, I tooke licenſe of him, and then put my ſelfe in ſervice with a Britaine, called Pregent Meno, which brought mee with him into Ireland. Now, when we were there arrived in the Towne of Corke, they of the Towne (becauſe I was arraied with ſome cloathes of ſilke of my ſaid Maſters) came unto me, and threatned upon me, that I ſhould be the Duke of Clarences ſon, that was before-time at Dublin.

(57) But forſomuch as I denyed it, there was brought unto mee the holy Evangeliſts, and the Croſſe, by the Major of the Towne, which was called Iohn Lewelin, and there in the preſence of him and others, I tooke mine oath (as the truth was) that I was not the fore-ſaid Dukes ſonne, nor none of his bloud. And after this came unto mee an Engliſhman, whoſe name was Stephen Poitron, and one John Water, and laid to me in ſwearing great oathes, that they knew well that I was King Richards Baſtard-Sonne; to whom I anſwered with like oathes, that I was not. Then they adviſed mee not to be afeard, but that I ſhould take it upon me boldly; and if I would ſo doe, they would ayde and aſſiſt me with all their power againſt the King of England; and not onely they, but they were well aſſured, that the Earle of Deſmond and Kildarre would doe the ſame.

(58) For they forced not what part they tooke, ſo that they might bee revenged on the King of England: and ſo againſt my will made me to learne Engliſh, and taught me what I ſhould doe and ſay: And after this they called me Duke of Yorke, ſecond Sonne to King Edward the fourth, becauſe King Richards Baſtard-ſonne was in the hands of the King of England. And upon this the ſaid Water, Stephen Poitron, John Tiler, Hubert Burgh, with many others, as the forefaid Earles, entred into this falſe quarrell, and within ſhort time, others. The French King ſent an Ambaſſador into Ireland, whoſe name was Loit Lucas, and Maſter Stephen Friham, to adverciſe mee to come into France: and thence I went into France, and from thence into Flanders, and from Flanders into Ireland, and from Ireland into Scotland, and ſo into England.

(59) From having thus beene made a publique ſpectacle, till all eyes were wearied with the view, and imaginations tyred with thinking; hee is conveied to the Tower of London: where it had beene happy, if hee had onely wrought his owne deſtruction; but the bloudy fate (ſo to ſpeake of his diſaſterous birth) would not ſuffer him to periſh ſingle. In the ſame Tower was priſoner Edward the young Earle of Warwicke, having ſo beene from the firſt yeare of Henry to this preſent, for no fault of his, but for that, as neere Titler to the Crowne, hee carried in his living perſon inſeparable matter of danger and ſedition. Of his ſimplicity, by reaſon of his education in priſon from his infancy, there is a report, that as one vvho lived out of the vievv of the vvorld, hee knevv not an * Henne from a Gooſe, or one Fovvle or Creature from another. To haſten the ruine of ſo innocent a danger, behold there breakes forth a counterfeit Earle of Warwicke, as if all that vvhich the vvorld ſavv horrible in Perkins darings, had been but a document to inſtruct others in the like, and that nothing were to be taxed therein, but want onely of ſucceſſe, vvhich vvhoſoever could propound to himſelfe all things elſe vvere full of encouragement and reaſon. This counterfeit vvas a * Cordvvainers ſonne of London, aged about tvventy yeares, and called * Ralfe Wilford, vvho for falſely aſſuming the name and title of the ſaid Earle, being thereunto taught and ſubborned (a practiſe vvhich vvell declared that the malicious Dutcheſſe of Burgundy did ſtill live) vvas hanged at S. Thomas Waterings by Southvvarke upon Shroutetueſday.

(60) This nevv deviſe to uncrovvne King Henry, ſo vvakened his owne feares, and the eyes of the Caſtilians, (vvho had ſecretly agreed to marry their Princeſſe Katherine to our Prince Arthur) that there ſeemed no ſure ground of ſucceſſion, if that the Earle of Warwicke were not made away. A fearefull caſe, where the falſe reaſon of State ſhall faine to it ſelfe an impoſſibility of well doing, without ſhedding innocent bloud, and ſhall therefore reſolve to found upon ſo crying a ſinne, the hope of perpetuity in ſucceſſion; ſith nothing is truer, then that ſinne was ever an unſure baſis to ſettle laſting workes upon. But O the narrow capacities of the moſt ſeeing men! the confidence whereof did undoubtedly leade this King (herein not juſtifiable, howſoever excuſable in reſpect of humane frailty, which might propound to it ſelfe many feares, and reſpects both publique and private) to connive at the plotted death, or rather formall murther of this harmeleſſe Gentleman, whoſe vvrong may yet move the hardieſt to compaſſion, as it aftervvard ſtirred

A counterfeit Earle of warwicke executed

The true Earle of warwicke deſigned to die.

God in justice to revenge, prospering no part of that great worke which was thereupon thus corruptly sought to be perpetuated. That noble Lady Katherine her selfe was hereof so sensible, that when the divorce was afterward prosecuted against her by King Henrie the eight, her second Husband, she is reported to have said, That it was the hand of God, for that to cleare the way to her marriage, that innocent Earle of Warwicke was put to unworthy death. Neither let licentious practises vouch the singular Act of Solomon in taking away the life of his elder Brother Adoniah to colour this homicide: for hee that will argue from particular facts in Scripture, shall not onely leave to Adoniah living, but perhaps no Salomon. To worke this young Warwickes ruine, the mischievous and dismall wretch Perken becomes an occasion, if not an instrument, for he by his supple insinuations, and flowing promises, had corrupted his keepers, the servants of Sir John Digbie Knight, Lieutenant of the Tower; who (as * was affirmed) meant to have murthered their Master, and then to have set Perken, and the Earle at large, to which practise of escape, the poore Earle is said to have consented. Perken for this conspiracy had his tryall at Westminster, and he, together with one John a Waters, who had been sometime Major of Corke in Ireland, were condemned, and being drawne to Tyborne, had the sentence of death executed upon them. Perken at the Gallowes did reade his former confession, taking on his death that the same was true, and under-went his punishment with patience. Walter Blewet, and Thomas Astwood (being two of the Conspirators, for the other two, Strangewaies and Long-Roger, being the Lieutenants men also, were not executed, nor for so much as we have read, arraigned) not long after received the reward of their offence at the same place.

(61) Iustice thus tooke hold at last of Perken Warbecke, on whom, the Proverbe which saith, that Pride is the Vsher of shame, was worthily verified. Neither could the world accuse King Henry for his death, unlesse it were, for that he had not hanged him sooner, but suffered him to live till he had drawne after him a greater ruine in Warwickes person, then in all the former Tragedies. For this Earle being a chiefe Prince of the bloud, and next heire-Male of his House to the Crowne of England, (a crime of which his birth onely made him guilty, and not any fact of his) being thus charged to have given assent to Perkens plot of escape, he was publikely arraigned before the Earle of Oxford (then High Steward of England) by the name of Edward Plantagenet Earle of Warwicke, and indited for minding to have escaped (as * they said) out of the Tower, and consequently (according to the dreadfull license of inferences among our English pleaders in cases of death) to deprive King Henry of his royall Crowne and dignity, and to usurpe the Title and soveraigne office, prosecuting their bloudy Poetry with the like fangination syllogismes, though utterly without measure, or fashion. The Earle doubly betrayed, first by the setters of the snare, and then by their silly or deceitfull perswasions who were put about him, confesseth the enditement, and submitteth himselfe to the Kings mercy; that is, offered up his head to be a slippery foundation of King Henries further purposes; for sentence of death was thereupon pronounced as against a Traitour. This one practise seemes sufficient, if not to cast upon Henry the Title of a shrewd and perillous man, yet to raise a doubt, whether (* as one writes) he was more sincere and entire then Ferdinand King of Spaine, upon whom (saith that Authour) hee did handsomely bestowe the envie of the death of Edward Plantagenet Earle of Warwicke. The life therefore of this Prince (according to rigour of law) being thus in his power, the King gently pardoned all the paines, but the losse of his head, which was cut off upon a scaffold at Tower-hill, and then (another gracious favour) his body was not buried in the Chappell of the Tower, or in any other common place, but at * Bisham by his Ancestors. Iealous (saith * one) the King was over the greatnesse of his Nobility, as remembring how himselfe was set up; and much more did this humour encrease in him after hee had conflicted with such Idols and Counterfeits, as Lambert Simnel and Perken Warbecke. The strangeneste of which dangers made him thinke nothing safe. This Earle was the last heire-male of the bloud, and surname of Plantagenet; whose race, as it was a long time glorious for giving Kings to England, (even from King Henry the second) so in the end (chiefly for the house of Yorke) it became hatefull (as it seemes) to God and man, for the most horrible and inexpingvible deadly fewdes, murthers, perjuries, and other horrors committed within it selfe, which (as then not fully expiated) lay heavily upon the head of this Earle, and finally threw open all those fences, which the possession of Majesty, and numerosity of issue had for sundry ages cast about it, letting in thereby the surname of Tydder, being but two descents English, and which now after three descents and five Princes is also vanished. Now, among those few great workes of peace which ensued these firebrands of warre, we must remember the marriage of Prince Arthur, with the Princesse of Spaine Lady Katherine: The interim from Warwickes death till then, brought forth a very great plague, whereof in London there are said to have dyed about thirty thousand. The King, and Queene remove to Callis in May and returned in June. The maine * busines was to review and ratifie the state of amity, and negociations, between the English and the Duke of Burgundies Subjects. Shine also was burnt, and the like, it will be fitteſt to have recourse to vulgar Annals.

(62) The Coast of State now seeming cleare from all thickning weather, Ferdinand and Isabella King & Queen of Spain, according to the points of agreement betweene them, and King Henry, concerning their fourth daughter the Lady Katherine (borne at Alcala de Finari, or Complutum) sent her royally appointed in a goodly Fleet to England, there to fulfill in person, what hitherto had beene onely treated of, who after many difficulties tooke land at * Plimmouth in October. Ferdinand her father was the sonne of John King of Arragon and Sicilia, and although hee was unlearned, as being brought up among armes and souldiers, yet by using the familiarity of wise men hee also became very wise, and proved that great Prince, which first in these latter times recalled the old glory of Spaine: and reared it to such an envious magnitude, as that the jealousie thereof hath bred no small quarrels in Christendome. For by his marriage with Isabella, (sole sister and heire to Henry the fourth King of Castile, and Leon,) he reigned in right of his wife; and joyntly with her, over those two Kingdomes and their appurtenances, who together (saith * Marineus of Sicilia) did admirable things, and works most holy. They * recovered the huge City and Kingdome of Granada, and part of Andaluzia from the Moores, after they had beene in violent possession thereof seaven hundred and foureſcore yeares, and having purged those places from the filth of Mahomets superstitions, built Churches to the honour of Iesus Christ, by occasion whereof Ferdinand was surnamed the Catholicke King. The walles of the City of Granada at the time of the surrender, which (after about tenne yeares warres) was by Voabdelin King thereof, made to Ferdinand and Isabella, had * twelve miles in compasse, and in the same twelve Gates, and a thousand Towers, enclosing seaven Hills covered with building, innumerable people, and inestimable riches, and the Spanish forces at this conquest were about 12000. Horse, and one hundred thousand foot. The said King and Queene, besides many other their mighty actions, did also first discover America, by Christopher Columbus, and thereby brought a whole whole new World to the notice of Christendome. Isabella her selfe, descended of the bloud-royall of England, being daughter of John the second King of Castile and Leon, sonne of Henrie the third King of Castile and Leon, and of Katherine his wife, (daughter of * John Duke of Lancaster, third sonne of our Edward the third of triumphall and never-dying memory) was a Lady, whose * like the Christian world had seldome any of that wisdome, gravity, chastity, and of so labourious a devotion, that * she did not one-ly day by day performe the Canonicall, and howrely taske of prayers vsed by Priests, but many other, and brought up her children accordingly.

(63) The Lady Katherine being about eighteene yeares old, and borne of so great, so noble, so victorious and vertuous parents, is with just majesty and solemnity openly * married in Pauls-Church to Arthur Prince of Wales, aged about fifeene yeares, and eldeſt sonne to Henry the seaventh, King of England, and of Elizabeth his wife. The Archbishop of Canterbury, assisted with nineteene Bishops and Abbots mytred, joyned their hands, and performed all the other Church Rites upon that great day. The vulgar Annals can tell you the splendor and glory thereof, in Apparell, Iewels, Pageants, Banquets, Guests, and other princely complements, the onely weighty businesse of many weake braines. A grave Lady (as some have written) was laid in bed betweene the Bride, and Bride-groome, to hinder actuall consummation, in regard of the Princes greene estate of body; but others alleadge many arguments to prove that matrimoniall performance was betweene them, how soever her self, (when that afterward came in question) * appealed to the conscience of King Henry the eight (her second husband) if he found her not a Maid. But Prince Arthur enjoyed his marriage a very short while, for in April following he died at Ludlow, being under sixeteene yeares of age: being a Prince, in whose youth the lights of all noble vertues did clearely beginne to shine. His aptnesse to learne was almost incredible; for (by the report of his * Master) he had either learned without booke, or otherwise studiously turned and revolved with his owne hands and eyes these Authors following. In Grammar, Garin, Perot, Sulpitius, Gellius, and Valla: In Poettie, Homer, Virgil, Lucan, Ovid, Silius, Plautus, and Terence: In Oratorie, Tullies Offices, Epistles, Paradoxes, and Quintilian: In Historie, Thucydides, Livie, Cæsars Commentaries, Suetonius, Tacitus, Plinius, Valerius Maximus, Salust, Eusebius. Wherein wee have beene particular, to signifie what Authors were then thought fit to be elementary and rudimentall unto Princes; and by their example, to all of Noble or gentle birth, whose superficiall boldnesse in bookes in these frothy dayes, is become most scandalous and injurious to the honour, and use of learning.

(64) But before the untimely expiration of this great hope of England, King Henry weary of warres and tumults, and desirous to lay the beginnings of a long peace by most inward friendship with all his great neighbours, had concluded a match betweene Margaret his eldeſt Daughter, and Iames the fourth King of Scotland, the * affiurance whereof was published in the February next before Prince Arthurs death at Pauls-Crosse; in rejoycement whereof, Te Deum was sung, and other signes of publike joy declared. The * Bishop of Rosse saith, that the Earle of Bothwell did openly hand-fast, or espouse the said faire Lady, in the name of King Iames at Pauls-Crosse, being Saint Pauls day. This Contract was brought about in manner following. After that the storme of warre had (by mediation as before-said) beene throughly laid betweene the two sister-Nations, it chanced certaine of the Scots by their suspitious behaviour, and rough Phrases to provoke the Garrison of Norham-Castle to issue, who in the bickering slew and hurt some of them, and drove the rest away. King * Iames expostulates this violence very sharpely by letters with King Henry, who returned most satisfactory answers. Richard Fox Bishop of Durham (whose the men and Castle were) wrote also many deprecatory letters, humbly praying the Scottish King to accept amends, whereunto he in the end inclined, and having some matters of farre greater moment to impart, desired the Bishops presence in Scotland, (knowing his deepe wisdome, and great grace with his Soveraigne) which King Henry gladly assented unto. The meeting was at Melrose, an Abbey of Cistercian Monks, where the King abode, who having roundly uttered to the Bishop his offence conceived for the breach of good termes at Norham-Castle, and yet being finally pleased to receive satisfaction, hee then secretly discovered his whole minde, the summe whereof was, That the King of England would be pleased to give to him in marriage the Lady Margaret his eldeſt Daughter, as a pledge of indissoluble amitie. The Bishop promised his best diligence, and accordingly after his returne, laboured therein with King Henry, who most gladly hearkened thereunto. Whereupon the Scottish King sent the Archbishop of Glasco, the Earle of Bothwell, and others, to demand the Lady in marriage. Their entertainment was hearty and Princely. But when the proposition came to scanning at the Councell-Table, it had not currant passage at first: for there were who objected as an inconvenience; That by this marriage the Crowne of England might come to the Scottish line, by the issue of Lady Margaret. Whereunto it is said, King Henry made this answere, * What if it should? for if any such thing should happen, (which omen God forbid) I see it will come to passe, that our kingdome shall loose nothing thereby, because there will not be an accession of England to Scotland, but contrarily of Scotland unto England, as to that which is farre away the most noble head of the whole Iland, seeing that which is lesse vseth to accrue to the ornament and honour of that which is much the greater, as Normandy heretofore came to be under the dominion and power of the English our fore-fathers. When this was said, the whole boord of Councell received it as an Oracle, and it went cleare about, That Margaret should be married to the King of Scotland. With this answer, and other instructions, the Scottish Ambassadours were sent home, who afterward returned into England with full authority and satisfaction to all Henries propositions, whereupon ensued the before-said publishment of assurances at Pauls-Crosse. It was a principall Article in this agreement: That no Englishman should enter Scotland, nor Scot into England without commendatory letters from their Soveraigne. Which Article was reputed a speciall meane to preserve the peace inviolable.

(65) But ere the youg Lady her selfe was conveyed into Scotland, her brother Prince Arthur dyed, and in * February next ensuing, their Mother also Queene Elizabeth, as thee lay in Child-bed within the Tower of London. The King to repaire his mind with fresh Consolations, in advancing his onely remaining sonne, Henry Duke of Yorke, created him suddainly Prince of Wales, Earle of Chester and Flint, within few dayes after his Mothers decease. Thus was Arthurs losse supplied, how soever. Henry made Prince, espoused soone after (* though with much reluctation) the Lady Katherine his elder brothers Widdow, * upon the five and twentieth of Iune, at the Bishop of Salisburies house in Fleetstreet. And in this wise, by providing so worthy a Wife for him, (though to say truth, her great Dower was the chiefe motive (the King thought, that the estate of England was sufficiently setled; wherfore converting his cares to the accomplishment of affinity with Scotland, hee most sumptuously furnished his deereſt eldeſt daughter for her journey, and himselfe in person travelled from Richmond as farre with her as Colmeston beside Northampton, where his Mother the Countesse lay: * after certaine dayes spent in solace, the King gave her his blessing, with fatherly counsell and exhortation, exhortation, and committed the guard and conduct of her person principally to the Earles of Surrey and Northumberland, and to such Ladies and Gentlewomen as were appointed to that service; a great company of Lords, Knights, Esquiers, and men of Marke attending them as farre as Barwicke. At S*t*. Lamberts Church in Lamer Moore within Scotland, the King attended by the principall of his Nobles, received her from the hands of the Earle of Northumberland, and the next yeare after, married her at Edenborough, in the presence of his Nobility. The King gave great entertainment to the English, and shewed them justing and other pastimes, after the Scottish fashion. The Scottish-men (saith * the Bishop of Rosse) were not behinde, but farre above the English-men, both in apparell, rich jewels, and massie chaines, many Ladies having their habiliments set with Gold-smith worke, garnisht with Pearle and Stone of price, with gallant and well-trapped horses. Diverse Ladies, also and young Gentlewomen of England, attending Queene Margaret, remained there, and were well married to certaine Noblemen of Scotland, whose progenie lives honourably there even to these dayes. The effect of this marriage is gravely described by the same Bishop in these words: There was perfect peace and sincere amity betweene the two Realmes of England and Scotland a long time after. And verily, during the life of King Henry the seventh, no cause of breach was minisired by either of the Princes, but they continued in great love and friendship, and mutuall societie, contracting of Marriages, continuall enterchange of Merchandise betwixt the Subiects of both the Realmes, as they had beene A ll under the obedience of One Prince; where-through, Iustice, Policy and Riches did flourish and abound throughout the whole Isle of Albion. And of this marriage was Iames the first descended, being that One Prince under whose obedience A ll were governed, and (God be praised) now are by Our Gracious Soveraigne King Charles, as under the sole and lawfull lineall Monarch of Great Britaine: for that Iames the fourth had Issue Iames the fift, he had Issue Queene Mary, shee had Issue Iames the fixt, the great Grand-child of the said Queene Margaret eldest daughter of King Henry the seaventh.

(66) Which effects of peace and riches, as they could not but be comfortable to so wise a King as Henry, they being the fruit as it were of his owne paſt labours; so let us now obſerve the laſt worldly cares of his raigne, and upon what objects hee fixed his minde, freed from the awe of open challenges of the Crowne, and from throwes at his maine, which with what art, valour and felicity, heat firſt atchieved, and with how great hazards, troubles, and bloudy buſineſſes, hee brought it to ſuch paſſe, that neighbour-kings reputed it ſafe to enter-marry with his Family, we have already heard: Two principall points tooke up the laſt Scenes of his life; for the reſt of his time he wholly emploied, either in the ſervice of Almighty God (wherein he was ſo diligent, that every day he was preſent after the devotions of thoſe times, at two or three Maſſes, oftentimes hearing godly Sermons) or in building, wherwith he kept his ſenſes buſied. The one of the two chiefe points, was to watch over the wayes of his wives kindred (the remaining branches of the turbulent and unfortunate houſe of Yorke) whoſe growth and greatneſſe hee ſuppoſed might at ſome time or other over-top his owne; the other was, under opinion of juſtice, to encreaſe his treaſure out of the common purſes, whereby he feemed onerous to many, and ſomewhat obſcured the brightneſſe of his former glory, at leaſt-wiſe diminiſhed his opinion with the generality. Conſidering his courſes holden with his wives kindred, (the late-rall iſſues and ſtaddles of the Plantagenets) it fell out thus; which (by * occaſion of the accidentall landing of Philip King of Spaine at this time, whereby the * Earle of Suffolkes taking was procured) we thought it beſt to handle here together. Edmund de la Pole Earle of Suffolke, (ſonne to John Duke of Suffolke, and of Elizabeth ſiſter to King Edward the fourth) in the ſixteenth yeare of King Henries raigne, wilfully flew a common perſon in his fury. Henry not ſorry to have occaſion of increaſing his popularity, by preſenting ſo great a perſon to exemplary juſtice, and in the ſame act to blemiſh the honour of a man, whoſe quality was to him ſuſpected, cauſed him for the ſame to bee arraigned. The fact he was perſwaded to confeſſe, and thereupon had pardon. The Earle neverthelеſſe, as a Prince of the bloud, holding himſelfe diſgraced, by having beene ſeene a priſoner at the Kings-Bench-Barre, fled the Land diſcontented, and went to his Aunt the Dutcheſſe Dowager of Burgundie; but within a while after, being fairely reconciled, he returned. After w*ch*, notwithſtanding, whether it were by reaſon of debt (the certaine attendant of vaine-ſpirited, and baſe-brave-minded Courtiers) whereinto he had deepely throwne himſelfe, for his furniture, at the Celebration of his Cozen Prince Arthurs marriage, or for that the reſtleſſe ſpirit of envie in the Dutcheſſe had prevailed, he taking his brother with him, fled againe the next yeare after. The King, who had pardoned his life, ſeemed now to repent his clemencie,* though it is plaine, he ſpared him of purpoſe, till hee might diſcover more of a conſpiracy which hee knew was in hammering, but his ſlight troubled him not a little, knowing the violent humour of that Lord, and remembring to what a dangerous and bloudy iſſue his brother the Earle of Lincolne had once already brought things at the battell of Stoke in the beginning of his reigne.

An office unworthy of Knighthood; neither can any good ſpirit in the world ſtoop it ſelf to ſuch double-faced employment, which beſides the treacherous diſſimulations therof, cannot but be accompanied with willfull impieties. For who is admitted into truſt upon a contrary ſide, without invocations of Gods holy Name, proteſtations, adjurations, oathes, the utmoſt aſſurances which man can give to man, to beget a convenient affiance in his ſincerity? but by this ſtratagem the King ranſacks the boſomes and cabinets of his adverſaries, diſcovering their deſignes and hopes. Whereupon, William Courtney Earle of Devonſhire (being moſt nobly deſcended, and having to his wife the Lady Katherine, one of the daughters of King Edward the fourth, and ſiſter to Queene Elizabeth wife of King Henry) William de la Pole brother to the ſaid Edmund Earle of Suffolke, Sir James Tyrrell, Sir John Windham Knights, with other, were attached, and committed to cuſtody, and afterward alſo * George Nevill Lord Abergenie, and Sir Thomas Greene Knight, were likewiſe apprehended, but were ſoone delivered. (68) This ſo round and quicke dealing with the Earles complices and favourers, ſtartled his ſhallow, and raw inventions, and made their whole bulke to ſwarve and ſplinter; but the King reſted not ſo; for upon the Sunday before the feaſt of S. Simon and Iude, in the ſame yeare, of the ſaid executions, there was publiſhed at Pauls-Croſſe, by the Kings procurement from Pope Alexander the ſixt, a Bull of * Excommunication and curſe againſt the ſaide Earle of Suffolke, Sir Robert Curſon, and five other perſons by ſpeciall name, and generally all other which ayded the Earle againſt the King, to the diſturbance of the Kingdome. Thus did the moſt prudent Henry purſue his enemies, not onely with ſecret countermines and open weapons of Law, before they could aſſemble to make any ſhew, but alſo with ſpirituall lightenings; which doubtleſſe, had they beene upon juſt cauſe, and by lawfull authoritie fulminated, ought infinitely to be dreaded of good Chriſtians, becauſe (as Saint Paul ſaith) they deliver over to Satan. Sir Robert Curſon was named, of purpoſe, to make the Earle ſecure of him; which may well be called a perillous, if not a prophane deviſe, though his Holineſſe were made the inſtrument thereof. Neither did the King leave here, for by his Letters and Meſſengers hee ſo prevailed with Pope * Alexander, as hee decreed by his Bull, *That no perſon ſhould afterward have privilege of Sanctuary, who had once taken the ſome, and come forth againe: and that, * if any Sanctuary-man ſhould afterward commit any murther, robberie, ſacrilledge, treaſons, &c. hee ſhould by lay force be drawne thence to ſuffer due punishment.* Thus was of great uſe to the King, and preſerved many Subjects from precipitation, for, the abuſe of Sanctuaries had beene an efficient of many troubles. But the ſame Pope (having ſent John Giglis his Receiver, to gather money in England) ſhewed himſelfe much more favourable to ſuch as perpetrated thoſe ſaid hainous offences, as alſo, Vſury, Symonie, Rapines, Adulteries, or whatſoever offences, (excepting certaine offences againſt the Pope and Clergy, &c.) when hee ſent a * Bull of pardons (for money) to all ſuch offendors in England; diſpenſing alſo thereby, with ſuch, as kept away, or by any fraud had gotten the goods of other men, which they ſhould now retaine ſtill without ſcruple of conſcience, ſo as they paide a ratable portion thereof unto his Holineſſe Receivers. Sir Robert Curſon (though before accurſed by the Pope) returnes, when he ſaw fit time into England, and withall into wonted favour with his Soveraigne. The Earle, ſeeing himſelfe thus ſtripe of all hope to doe much harme, wandred about Germany, and France to finde repoſe, but in the end quite tyred, hee put himſelfe into the grace and protection of Philip then in Flanders, who by the death of Iſabella was King of Spaine, in right of Ione his Wife, eldeſt Daughter of Ferdinand and Iſabella; where hee remained in baniſhment, till King Philip was driven by tempeſt in the moneth of Ianuary into England, as hee meant to have paſſed through the ſleeve, or Engliſh Ocean, into Spain, there to take poſſeſſion of that Kingdome, and other the appurtenances.

(69) The chiefe Ship of the Navie-Royall, wherein the King was, and two other (all the reſt being ſcattered by the fury of the weather into ſeverall places and other Ports of England,) thruſt into Harbour at * Falmouth. Himſelfe weary and ſicke with the violent toſſings of the Sea (whereunto hee had never, as it ſeemes, beene uſed,) would needs come on ſhoare, and refreſh his ſpirits, though the principall men about him diſſwaded that courſe, as foreſeeing it would procure a longer ſtay, then the nature of their occaſions would perhaps well beare. And ſo indeed it fell out, for being now in another Princes (though his friends) Dominions, where he had no power over himſelfe, nor others, and the rumour of arrivall ſtirring the men in authority thereabout; Sir Thomas Trenchard Knight with the ſudden forces of the Country, not knowing what the matter might be, came thither, and underſtanding the royall quality of the perſon, invited him with all humble humanity to his houſe, and forthwith diſpatched poſtes to Court; not long after Sir John Carey Knight, (with a great troupe of armed men) repaired alſo, purſuing the like humble entreaties; which the King, fearing conſtraint, becauſe they were but ſubjects, and durſt nor let him paſſe without their Lord and Maſters leave neceſſarily yeelded unto. Vpon notice of this mighty Princes caſuall arrivall, King Henry preſently commanded the Earle of Arundell to entertaine him till himſelfe could come, who very magnificently did ſo, with * three hundred Horſes by Torch-light, and in the meane-while King Henry himſelfe prepares. Philip perceiving, that whatſoever ſpeed his affaires required, yet now there was no remedy but to ſtay, thought not good to expect his approach, but to prevent it, and came upon the ſpurre to Windſor, that hee might be gone againe the ſooner, after whom Queene Ioan his Wife came leaſurably. The reſt of this entertainement, becauſe it hath matter of weight, and is well ſet downe by Polydor Virgil, it ſhall ſuffice us to follow his ſoorſteps. At Windſor the two Kings, after long and ſeverall diſcourſes, began to conferre about renewing their league. Henrie required that Edmund Earle of Suffolke might be delivered up into his power, which Philip denyed to be a thing that he could doe, as holding it moſt unreaſonable to bee the authour of his death, whom he had taken into protection: but when at the laſt he found, that no excuſe nor reaſon could ſatisfie, for that, Henrie voluntarily offered to ſave the Earles life, he promiſed to do therein what he deſired, and preſently took order for his ſending over. According whereunto, King Henrie (to draw out the time, till he had the wiſhed prey) conveied King Philip to London, to ſhew him the head Citie of his Kingdome, out of which, after a little ſtay, he re-conducted him. The Earle in the meane time, who conceived horror at the firſt newes of King Philips landing in England, as fatall to him, and reſolved that no hope was longer to bee repoſed in the faith of forraine Princes, came over not unwillingly, preſuming that after pardon of life, hee might alſo in time re-gaine his liberty; or if that hope failed, yet ſhould he at leaſt-wiſe obtaine to die, and be buried in his Countrey. But King Philip and his Queene, having feaſted with her ſiſter the Princeſſe of Wales, departed England. The Earle was brought through Flanders to Callis upon the ſixteenth of March, and landed at Dover upon the foure & twentieth of the ſame, conveyed thither by Sir Henrie Wyat, and Sir John Witſhire, with threeſcore men in armour of the Garriſon of Callis; and at Dover Sir John Lovel, and others receiving him, guarded him ſafe to the Tower of London. King Philip, not long after his landing in Spaine deceaſed, being not thirtie yeares old. That tempeſt which drave him into England, was holden by the people as prodigious; for it blew downe the Golden-Eagle from the famous Spire of Pauls-Steeple (being of Copper, richly over-guilt, of forty pounds weight, in length foure foot, and in bredth three,) which alſo in the fall therof, brake and battered the ſigne of the Blacke-Eagle, in Pauls-Church-yard, in the place where now hee Schoole-houſe ſtands. This accident even then made ſome conjecture, that the Emperour Maximilian (whoſe Imperiall Enſigne the Eagle is) ſhould ſuffer ſome accordingly (ſaith Polydor) as indeed hee did by the death of King Philip his ſonne. Which (if any ſuperſtitiouſly delight in Calculations of that blinde nature) wee may well paralell with that * lightning which ſtroke the Letter C. out of Cæſar in the inſcription of Cæſar Auguſtus his ſtatue; whereupon it was gathered, that Auguſtus ſhould live but one hundreth daies after, and then be called a god. (Æſar the remaining ſyllables ſo ſignifying in the old Hetruſcan tongue,) which accordingly hapned.

King Henries gathering of treasure.

(70) Thus was the Earle of Suffolke brought backe, and the King anchored his quiet at the safe custody of his person within the Tower. The other worldly point wherein he chiefly bestowed his ages care, was to gather money, though by courses seeming very grievous and full of bitternesse; the tooe griping greedinesse, and too-profuse lavishnesse of money in Princes, being both alike offensive to a well-setled estate. Some excuse his doings herein (amongst whom Polydor is chiefe) as not proceeding from any depravation, or uncorrected affection of his nature; but from an opinion and fore-cast of generall profit: because a Princes humour of gathering tenderth, though with distaste of particular men, to the good publique, wheras his profusenesse, though with some particular mens profit, endeth in the empoverishment of the whole. And Henry himselfe protested (saith Polydor) hee did it not for love of money, but with a purpose to bridle the fierce mindes of a Nation bred up among factions: though they (saith the same Author) who felt the smart, and were wounded by his Instruments,* cryed out they were not so much the darts of severity, which did hit them, as of avarice, Yet Polydors Apologie may be currant: for it is not to be doubted, but that such use the King might propound himselfe; and yet withall, wee can hardly finde any commendable root thereof, the wayes being so importune and harsh, by which hee raised money. Let us heare in this point the observative

* Sir Fr. Bac. in S. King Henry gives way to the needlesse mobilitation of his people.

* Knight. Of Nature (saith he) Henry coveted to accumulate treasure, which the people (into whom there is infused, for the preservation of Monarchies, anaturall desire to discharge of their Princes, though it be with the unjust charge of their Counsellors and Ministers) did impute unto Cardinall Morton, and Sir Reinald Bray, who (as it afterward appeared) as Counsellors of ancient authority with him, did so sound his humour, as nevertheless they tempered it. Where it is truely said, it afterward appeared: for till they were gone to account to God, and his feare for the maine quite banished, the King did not let loose the reines to his immoderate desire of having, which yet was not more sinfull, then the meanes under him practises, were odious. For * Empson and Dudley that followed, being persons that had no reputation with him, otherwise then the servile following of his owne humours, gave him way, and shaped him meanes to those extremities, whereby himselfe was touched with remorse at his death, and which his successor disavowed. And this we take to be a true judgement. To be particular in the recitall of things worthy to dye in forgetfulnesse, is not only to recite, but in a sort to teach them also, as some, who by broad invectives, have as it were read a lecture of those vices, against which they have pretended to inveigh. But publique and shamefull Arts may more safely be delivered. The instruments whom the King set on worke, (or who perhaps set the King on worke) were * two Lawyers, Richard Empson, (afterward Knighted) and Edmund Dudley Esquier; their employment was to call the richer subject into question for breach of old penall lawes, long before discontinued and forgotten, whereby they brake in upon the people, as it were at unawares, like a kinde of authorized robbers, masked under the pretext of service for the King, and the names of Delators, or Promotors, a * familiar sickneſſe in the times of ancient Tyrannies. But the courses to execute their imployment, were voyd of all conscience and colour. For one of them was to * outlaw persons secretly, and then to seize their estates, driving them to chargefull compositions with the King, and heavie bribes to the Authors of their trouble. More detestable was another practise of theirs: For there * were false Iurors and ring-leaders of false Iurors, who would never give any verdict against the will of their patrons, the said Empson and Dudley; so that if any durst stand out upon tryall, the destiny of their causes was squared forth by the leade rule of those fellows consciences; which to be a truth, the expiatory punishment which King Henry the eight tooke of them in the first yeare of his raigne, doth clearely convince, By these meanes many honest and worthy Subjects were rigorously fined, imprisoned, or otherwise afflicted, which filled the land with sorrow and repinings. Among very many others thus abused, Sir William Capell Alderman of London was eminent, as from whom, in the tenth yeare of the Kings raign, had beene scrued, under the colour of moth-eaten and un-revived Lawes, above sixteene hundreth pounds sterling, and was now againe plaide at afresh, and another hand drawen upon him for two thousand pounds, which, because he would not pay, hee was by Dudley commanded prisoner to the Tower; but by the death of the King which ensued, all such prisoners were released. If any perhaps will sleight the hard usage extended to Citizens, and to the like. they are unwise therein, neither thinke as Patriots ought. For though it may so fall out that the personall vexation of some few, merits no great pitty; yet the example is pestilent; & it is a part of the cunning, to chuse out at first such for patternes, as upon whose persons least compassion may fall, which examples may afterward be extended to whomsoever. These revels and rages against the wealthier fort continued, till it pleased God to sting the Kings heart with just compunction toward the horrour of his death; who had the favour from Heaven, as to lye sicke of a consuming disease, which wasted him by such insensible degrees, as gave him the use of his whole selfe (as it were) till the last gaspe, whereby he had meanes to recollect himselfe, after those many soule-wounding assaults to which attend regall greatnesse, and to submit his thoughts to such ghostly admonishments (touching another life) whereunto in dayes of health, the hearts or eares of great Princes are seldom attentive.

(71) About the yeare of his death, having understood that Lewis King of France, despairing of Issue-male, had disannulled the Contrets made betweene Charles King of Spaine, (sonne of the late King Philip, and afterward elected Emperour by the name of Charles the fift) and the Lady Claudia his eldest daughter, whom he newly betrothed to Francis of Valois Dolphin of France, and Duke of Angolesme; King Henry (whose care for preservation of the common quiet, and good of his Countrey, by forrain alliances, was ever wholly in him and awake) thought it a faire occasion for him to match his younger Daughter the Lady Marie. The French King to have the advise of Iames the fourth King of Scots, in the bestowing the said Madame Claudia his eldest Daughter, had before sent Bernard Steward Lord D'Aubigmie, and the President of Tholouze, Ambassadors for that purpose; who finally in effect received this answere: * That the said King Iames thought it best that his eldest daughter should bee married within his owne Realme of France; for if shee were married unto any forraine Prince, it might give colour to claime title to the said Realme afterward. And if hee did marry her at home, rather to him the saide Francis, whom hee had appointed to succeed then any other. Which resolution was very acceptable to King Lewis, because it jumped with his owne purpose, and it was followed accordingly. King Henry therefore hearing that King Charles might be obtained, so pursued the point * by the prudent managing of Richard Fox (now Bishop of Winchester) his Ambassador, that King Charles his Ambassadours comming out of Flaunders, where hee was educated, and meeting him at Calis, the affaire was opened, disputed, concluded, and the Lady Mary, then about ten yeares of age, (as King Charles himselfe) was by solemne contract assured to him for wife.

likelihood of perill by competitors, or busie Factionists, buried in the Tower, by the imprisonment of Edmund Earle of Suffolke; his people tractable and calme; his coffers full, and the state of things ripe for a successour: Death (the executioner of the Almighties sentence,) was ready to discharge him of the prison of his flesh. Before he departed, * well disposed persons tendering the health of his soule, did both in Sermons, and otherwise, informe him of the exclamations against Informers; Wherefore hee of his blessed disposition, granted to all men generall pardons, certaine onely excepted. In his life time hee founded the goodly Hospitall of the Savoy, built sixe religious Houses for Franciscan Friers, three of them for Observants, and the other three for Conventuals. Of his building also was Richmond-Pallace, and that most beautifull peece, the Chappell at Westminster, the one the place of his death, and the other of his buriall: which formes of more curious and exquisite building, he and Bishop Foxe, first (as is reported) learned in France, and thence brought with them into England. He died about the age of fifty two yeares, upon the two and twentieth of * April, having raigned twentie three yeares and eight moneths. A right noble, wise, victorious, and renowned King, and one whose pietie would have beene farre more eminent then all his other vertues, if from the beginning the malignant quality of the times would have permitted him to live in quiet. He specially honoured the remembrance of that Saint-like Man, Henry the sixt, the founder of his Family, and Prophetical fore-teller of that fortune which now he died feised of, whom also he laboured to have * Canonized for a Saint, but that Pope Iulius held that honour at too high a rate. It is reckoned by some Writers * of that age among his principall glories, that three Popes, Alexander the sixth, Pius the third, and Iulius the second, did in their severall times, with authoritie and consent of the Cardinals, elect and choose him for chiefe defensor of Christs Church, before all other Christian Princes. In his last Will and Testament, after the disposition of his Soule and Body, he devised and willed Restitution should be made of all such monyes as had unjustly beene levied by his Officers. A most pious and truely Christian care, whereby also appeareth, that he hoped the wrongs done under him were not so enormous nor innumerable, but that they might fall within the possibilitie of redresse. The description of his whole man, is had in the beginning of his life, and the course thereof described in his Actions. There remaine of his wisedome many effects, and those as his fame, likely to continue for ever.

(74) Emund, the third sonne of King Henry, and of Queene Elizabeth, was borne in the yeare of Christ, one thousand foure hundred ninety five, and in his young yeares was created Duke of Sommerset, which Title hee no long time enjoyed, being taken away by death at Bishops-Hatfield, before hee attained fully to five yeares of age, the yeare of Grace, one thousand foure hundred ninetie and five, and fifteenth of his Fathers Raigne, his Body lyeth enterred at Saint Peters in Westminster.

CHAPTER XXI.

An. Dom. 1509.

HEnrich and Wiſe King (Henry the ſeventh) gone (as is ſaid) the way of all fleſh, his Sonne bearing the ſame name, a moſt magnanimous and heroicall Prince, ſucceeded in his Throne over all his Dominions, as the onely true heire unto the Crowne, by both the Houſes of Lancaſter and Yorke. His birth was at Greenwich, in the yeare of Grace, 1491. the twentieth two of Iune: and in his youth ſo trained up in literature, that he was accounted the moſt learned Prince of all Chriſtendome, indued with parts moſt befitting a King, both in lineaments of body, and liberalitie of minde, beſide his ripe knowledge in politicke affaires, and was made the more agreeable to the affections, of men, by the conſideration of his flouriſhing age, as having not attained unto nineteene at his fathers death. In his infancy hee was created Duke of Yorke; at twelve yeares (his Brother deceaſed) Prince of Wales, and at eighteene became ſole Monarch of the Land, when at Weſtminſter upon Sunday the twenty fift of Iune, even the feſtivall of Saint Iohn Baptiſt, and yeare of Chriſt Ieſus, 1509. he with his beauteous Queene Katherine received their Crownes at the hands of William Warham Archbiſhop of Canterbury, no Prince giving better hopes unto juſtice, or ſeeking the wealth of his ſubjects more then himſelfe.

(2) His Counſellors hee choſe of the graveſt

Divines, and the wiſeſt Nobilitie, with whom he not onely often ſate, to the great encreaſe of his politicke experience; but would alſo yeeld his authoritie to their grave and ſarre in-ſeeing wiſedomes: Of whom the plaints of Petitioners were ſo movingly regarded, that Proclamations went forth, with promiſe of reſtitution, to them that had beene wronged by Dudley or Empſon, two perſons that had abuſed the authority of K. Henry his Father, by enriching their owne coffers, with the utter undoing of many better ſubjects. Theſe men, King Henry the ſeventh had made his Inſtruments for the finding out of offenders in his penall Statutes, themſelves being learned in the Lawes, and apt inough to execute their Commiſſions to the full: for, by their daily informations and recovering of fines, they digged and brought a ſilver Mine into the Kings Exchequer, ſome veines whereof by the way, ranne alſo into their owne coffers, to the great vexation of all, and utter undoing of many; whereat the Noblemen grudged, the Gentility repined, the Commons lamented, and all of them felt the teeth of theſe ravening Wolves: But, the Father-King departed, and his Sonne ſet on his Throne; the complaints of the oppreſſed ſo oppreſſed the King and his Councell, that Dudley and Empſon were ſent priſoners to the Tower, and both of them by a Parliament attainted of Treaſon.

(3) Edmund Dudley by deſcent was a Gentleman, and by profeſſion a Lawyer, having both wit and words at will; had he not abuſed both, to his owne deſtruction. Richard Empſon his inferiour by birth, was the ſonne of a poore Sieve-maker, but yet had hee ſtepped before him to the degree of a Knight: Theſe night-ſprung Muſhrumps that ſucked the earths fatneſſe, from farre better plants then themſelves, ſaw not the many hands ready to plucke them up by the rootes, when the ſeaſon ſhould ſerve to cleare the Land of ſuch weeds: for albeit they had their diſcharge under the Kings owne hand to doe what they did, and their ſervice knowne Crowne-ſervice, a matter impugnable, yet no ſooner were they left to ſtand upon their owne baſis, but that they felt the weight of their done wrongs too importable for them any longer to beare; for ſo importune were all degrees againſt them, that Dudley forthwith in Guild-hall London was arraigned and condemned to dye: and King Henry in progreſſe, (through the cry of the people) could take no pleaſure, till he had ſent for Empſon into Northampton-ſhire, where among them he was arraigned, and received ſentence of death, which was ſo deſired and followed, as to ſatisfie his Subjects, the King ſent a ſpeciall writ for their executions, which with great joy of all was performed upon Tower-hill, by taking from them their heads; when they left their riches to be ſpent by others, and their names to remaine upon Record for the Caterpillers of thoſe times: whoſe like, if any ſuch live, ſhall leave their hatefull remembrance to the like ſtaines of reproachfull infamy, how pleaſing ſoever the promotion ſo gotten in their owne eyes ſhall ſeeme, or the employments in their ſelfe-conceits accounted profitable to the State.

(4) This juſtice of King Henry wanne him great praiſe of his people, and his charitie extended towards London, when that Citie was ſore diſtreſſed with famine, by ſending fixe hundred quarters of corne, great love; ſo that never any King entred his raigne with better hopes then himſelfe. That his perſon was tall, is not to be doubted, though not like unto Sauls, as ſome have alledged, whoſe report is, that at the ſiege of Bulloigne, hee was higher by the head then any in his Campe, and every joynt proportionable to ſo royall a ſtature: but that he was ſtrong, his many Iuſts and Tilts, and fights at Tourney, (moſt dangerouſly performed) was manifeſted upon them that under-went his heavy hand: for at Tilt he bare downe a man at Armes both horſe and all, and threw Sir William Kingſton a Knight of great ſtrength to the ground at Barriers; with Battell-axe he combated againſt one Giot a Germane, very ſtrong and tall, and lent him better blowes then he could againe repay.

(5) His glory thus mounted the Trophie of fame, and young Henry the onely morning-ſtarre in this Weſterne Orbe; Pope Iulius the ſecond, fearing the further incroach of the French, who then had entred into ſome part of Italy, thought this Prince the ſtrongeſt pillar whereunto to truſt, and the fitteſt Card to trumpe the French King, well knowing the Title that the Engliſh Kings had unto France, and the readineſſe of his Subjects to forward that way: whereupon writing his letters unto King Henry, complained againſt Lewis the French King, and twelfth of that name, who neither (as he alledged) eſteeming of God, good fame, nor conſcience, detained the revenewes of the Clergie, ſupported the Cardinall William to aſpire the Papacy, ayded in the ſiege of Bonen Alfonſo of Ferrara, and the Bentevoly, both traitors to the Papall Sea, where he intended to lay the foundation of his Empire, to uſurpe all Italy, beſought him for the pittie of our Saviour, and by the vertue of his famous anceſtors, (for I uſe the words of the Popes Briefe) that never forſooke the Church of God in diſtreſſe, and by the ſtraight obedience, the ſtrongeſt bond, to enter into the holy league, they having elected him againſt Lewis, Caput fœderis Italici.

(6) And indeed to ſpeake as it was, Lewis much emulated King Henries greatneſſe, fearing that fortune would give him occaſions to make his claime by Sword unto the Kingdome of France; which the ſooner he did by this holy fathers inſtigations, and by his Herauld Clarentius roughly demanded, the Dutchies of Normandy, Guyen, Anjou, and Mayne, and with them alſo the Crowne that King Lewis ware. The Scottiſh King likewiſe, in caſe of Andrew Barton ſlaine in his Piracies (as the Engliſh alledged) by the Admirall of England, accounted the truce-broken, and fought the revenge upon the Borders adjoyning. Againſt theſe two Nations young Henry at once prepared, and happily obtained faire victories againſt both: but the ſucceſſe of the one, (though not following preciſely the time) we meane to relate before we enter diſcourſe of the other.

(7) The enterpriſe great which King Henry meant to undergoe, he thought it good wiſedome to joyne amitie with Maximilian the Emperour, Ferdinando King of Spaine, and many other Princes, holding alſo correſpondency with Pope Iulius the ſecond, that buſie Pontificall Prelate of Rome: then propounding his promiſes in Parliament, ſent over certaine Nobles before him into France, and afterward followed them himſelfe, pitching downe his Tents before the Towne of Terwin, where he raiſed his royall Standard of the Red-dragon, and begirt the Citie with a ſtrait ſiege.

(8) To this place Maximilian the Emperour repaired, and to the great honour of Henry entred into his pay, wearing the Croſſe of Saint George, with a roſe (the Kings badge) as his faithfull Souldier, and received wages by day for every of his, according to their degree: the French ſeeing the Towne in diſtreſſe, fought the reliefe with victuals, and men, but were ſo encountred by the King and his company, as that many of their chiefeſt Captaines were taken, and ſixe of their Standards wonne, the reſt for ſafeguard of life ſo poſted away, that this conflict was called the Battell of Spurres.

(9) Then was the battery brought ſo neere their wals, that many breaches were therein made, and the Towne by compoſition yeelded unto the King; whereupon the Earle of Shrewsbury was ſent to ſee all things ſafe, who ſtucke upon the higheſt Turret the Banner of Saint George, and tooke the oath of allegiance of all the French Citizens, to acknowledge King Henry their ſupreame Lord: This done, the King as a Conquerour entreth Terwin, ſent thence the ir their Ordnance, diſmounted the Turrets, caſt downe the walls, filled up the ditches, and fired the Towne, excepting onely the Cathedrall Church and Biſhops Pallace.

(10) Then was the ſiege removed unto Tournay: about which Citie King Henry commanded divers Trenches to bee caſt, and placed his Ordnance to ſuch advantage, that none might enter in, or come out of the ſame. Into this Towne a great number of the French from the Countries adjoyning had lately fled, relying much upon the ſtrength and ſafetie of the place, which indeed had ever beene accounted ſo invincible, that this ſentence was engraved over one of the gates. Iannes ton me à perdeu ton pucellage, Thou haſt never loſt thy maiden-head: Notwithſtanding, it was yeelded up unto Henry with ten thouſand pounds ſterling for the Citizens redemption, who to the number of foureſcore thouſand, then tooke their oathes to become his true Subjects, and foure of their principall bare up the Canopie, under which the King in triumph-wiſe entred, having borne before him his Sword, Axe, Speare, and other abiliments of warre, every Citizen holding a ſtaffe-Torch for his light. The ſafe keeping of this Citie the King committed to Sir Edward Poynings, Knight of the Order of the Garter, whom he there made his Lieutenant, and ordained Thomas Wolſey his Almoner the Biſhop of Tournay. The yeare now ſpent, and ſeaſon unfit for the Field, a ſurceaſe from warre was determined untill the next ſpring; wereupon all were ſhipped for England, with full payment, and praiſe, but Terwin and Tournay ſtucke heavily upon the French mens hearts.

(11) King Lewis thus endammaged in his owne Dominions, thought it beſt policie to pay like for like, to which end at the firſt attempts againſt Terwin hee ſolicited Iames the fourth of that name, King of Scotland (though brother by marriage unto King Henry of England) to diſturbe the Peace of his Subjects, that ſo hee might bee drawne out of France; which Iames for his part put preſently in practiſe: for writing his Letters to Henry in the French Kings behalfe, charged him with breach of Truce, both in the caſe of his Scots ſlaine at the Sea, as alſo againſt his Confederates the Duke of Gelder, and King of France, againſt which laſt hee deſired him to deſiſt, otherwiſe he ſhould be forced to revenge the Frenches wrongs upon his Engliſh: and to give Letters of Mart to recover the loſſes of his Subjects.

(12) King Henry a Prince of a Majeſticall ſpirit, moſt highly offended at theſe his Brothers requeſts, and threats, was ſo farre over-gone with fury and rage, that Lions King at Armes the bringer, was thereby ſomewhat daunted at his preſent anſwer, which he deſired might be ſent in writing, refuſing to carry in words his reply to his Soveraine. This Heralds wiſe and weightie requeſt was forthwith granted, and Letters framed to King Iames demands, anſwering thoſe imputations with roigh and round words, which notwithſtanding he never read or ſaw, being ſlaine in the battell of Flodden, before that Lions could come to deliver the ſame.

(13) For Iames King of Scots preparing for war, had in the meane while entred the borders, and with his Ordnance battered and wonne the Caſtell of Norham; making ſtill forward upon the Engliſh. Againſt whom Thomas Howard Earle of Surrey made the Kings Lieutenant of the North at his going into France, aſſembled an Army of twentie ſixe thouſand ſtrong, unto whom came his Sonne the Lord Admirall of England, with a great ſupply of good Souldiers well appointed for warre. The Earle from Newcaſtell came unto the water of Till, and pitched his battell beſides a little Towne called Brankeſton, under Flodden hill, a mountaine lying in the North of Northumberland, betwixt the Rivers Till and Tweed, where upon a riſing banke, the Scottiſh hoaſt had taken the advantage of the ground: unto King Iames, Thomas Earle of Surrey ſent Rouge-Croſſe a Purſevant at Armes, with proffer of battell to be done upon Friday the ninth of September, if ſo it pleaſed his Highneſſe, who withall carried this meſſage from the Lord Admirall, that he was come in perſon to juſtifie his act againſt Andrew Barton, and would abide the laſt drop of his bloud in the Vant-gard of the Field.

(14) King Iames moſt readily accepted the offer, and by his Herald Hay ſent the Earle word, that if he were as then in Edenbrough, yet would he moſt gladly come to fulfill his deſire; and withall ſent his Letters for the juſt occaſions given him to invade England as he did. The day approached, and the Scots keeping the higher ground, the Earle marched upward along the River, and by two Bridges paſſed over with his hoaſt, making ſtill forward, as though he meant either to have taken into Scotland, or elſe to circumvent King Iames his returne, which he perceiving, haſted downe the hill, putting from him his horſe, raiſed his royall Standard, and as a moſt valiant Chiefetaine encouraged his Souldiers to the fight.

(15) The Scottiſh Ordnance diſcharged from above, over-ſhot the Engliſh with very ſmall damage, and the ground of no difficult aſcent, gave them the eaſier acceſſe, ſo that Sir Edmund Howard, who led a wing to the Vant-gard (whereof his Brother the Admirall was Captaine) got almoſt to the height; againſt whom the Earles of Lenox and Argile, with their Battels of Speares on foot ſo violently encountred, that they beat downe and brake the wing of the Engliſh, wherein many were ſlaine, and the Horſemen diſbanded, and put to flight; but preſently recalled, joyned themſelves againe to the great battell, which by this time had attained to the toppe of the hill. King Iames that ſaw this firſt brunt performed, made full account that the day was his owne, ſuppoſing verily the Engliſh had fled, and therefore moſt valiantly he advanced forward, not ſtaying for the rereward to ſecond his battell, and encountring the Earles Battalion, a bloudy fight was performed, with the loſſe and life of many a man: but ſtrength neere ſpent, and the Scottiſh ſomewhat diſioyned, through force of a great ſhowre of Arrowes falling among them; Sir Edward Stanley having three bands reſerved for the like purpoſe, with a freſh on-ſet invaded the open ſides of the enemy, whoſe force was ſo violent, that the Scots no longer were able to ſtand, but tooke downe the hill unto flight, which the Earles of Lenox and Argile perceiving, did their beſt to ſtay them, and fighting moſt valiantly, themſelves were ſlaine in the ſame place.

(16) King Iames then perceiving the wings of his Battell diſtreſſed and gone, and that the enemy began to encloſe him about; with a ſtout reſolution incouraged his men, willing them to regard the perſon of their King, their owne honour, their valiant Anceſtors, and now this preſent employments; that their bloud might be bought deare to the Engliſh, and the Scottiſh valours recorded for ever in the volumes of Fame for this their one daies worke: and thereupon ruſhing among the thickeſt began a moſt eager and bloudy battell, & piercing through with a ſtrong hand went ſo far, that he had almoſt overthrowne the Earles Standard: thus buſied in doubtfull chance, the Lord Howard and Edward Stanley having diſcomfited the enemy in either wing, returned in the face of the maine battell, and the Lord Dacres with his Horſe-men came upon their backes, ſo that the Scottiſh were forced to fight in a round compaſſe, but being over-laid, the Kings Standard was ſtrucken downe, and himſelfe moſt valiantly fighting ſlaine in the middeſt of his enemies: with whom died three Biſhops, whereof one was Alexander Archbiſhop of Saint Andrewes the Kings baſe ſonne, two Abbots, twelve Earles, and ſeventeene Lords, Knights, Knights and Gentlemen a great number, in all about eight thousand, and almost as many taken prisoners, saith Paulus Iovius.

(17) The next day, when the Scouts had found the field cleared of enemies, and the English busied to bury their dead: the body of King James was found slaine among the rest, having received many bloudy wounds, and most of them deadly: for his sides were stucke thicke with sharpe arrowes, his necke cut into the middest, and his left hand in two places almost cut quite off. These wounds notwithstanding, he was descryed, and knowne by the Lord Dacres, and others to be the King: and thereupon his body bowelled, embalmed, and wrapped in Lead, was solemnely brought unto the Monastery of Shine in Surrey, where no doubt it was honourably entered: but at the dissolution of that House, in the daies of King Edward the sixt, it was (as almost all other Monuments were) disturbed of rest, and throwne into a waste roome among old Timber, Stone, and Lead, which John Stow, the Relater saith, himselfe so saw: and further declareth (let him be the Author) that the servants of Launcelot Young Glasier to the late Queene, being at Shine in new glasing the windowes, either upon a foolish pleasure, or desire of the Lead, cut the head from the rest: but smelling the sweet perfumes of the balmes, gave it to their Master, who opening the Lead, found therein the Head of a man retaining favour, though the moysture were cleane dried up, whose haire both of Head and Beard was red, which after he had well viewed, and a while kept, he caused to be buried in S. Michaels at Woodstreet London, the Church of the Parish wherein himselfe dwelled.

(18) Notwithstanding this faire tale of John Stow, Iohn Lesly Bishop of Rosse affirmeth, that it was held for certaine, the body thus found, was the body of the Laird Bonchard then slaine in the battell: and that King Iames was seene alive the same night at Kelso, whence he passed unto Ierusalem, and there spent the rest of his daies in holy contemplation: but howsoever it is (saith he) he never was seene any more in Scotland, no more then Charles Duke of Burgundy was in his Country after the Battell of Nanze: howbeit his people held a vaine opinion that he escaped, and would againe shortly returne. This battell was fought upon the ninth of September, the yeare 1513. and is commonly called the battell of Floddon, or Fladdon field: whence with victory, the Earle-Generall departed with the embalmed body of King Iames, whom he presented unto Queene Katherine, who with the Gauntlet of the slaine King sent the newes of the victory unto her Lord King Henry, then lying in his siege before the Towne Terwin.

(19) But as these his proceedings went prosperously forward, and his fame daily spread in further parts, so the Flemmings (who hitherto had held side with his foes) began to fall off suddenly, upon the occasion as followeth. It had beene concluded betwixt King Henry the seventh, and Philip King of Spaine, that Charles, his eldest sonne should marry Mary the younger daughter of the English King, with a Princely Dowry agreed upon, but she being young, and not ten yeares of age, and the Castilian unable to give assurance of her pension assigned, that match went not forward during the life of her Father, howbeit King Henry her brother regarding greatly her honour, provided for the marriage, and signified so much to the Counsell of Flanders: who dallied him off with many excuses, and lastly sent him word they could not receive her that yeare.

(20) This therefore gave Lewis King of France occasion to hammer at a Peace, and making Pope Leo his, they both together put it in practise; the readier was Henry to listen thereunto, both for the love he bore to his sister, and for the great regard he held of the Apostolike See, whence Iulius the second, and this Popes Predecessor had lately sent him a Cappe of Maintenance and Sword, and by decree of Councell given him the Title Christianissimo; which were received with great thankes, and solemnities. The French Kings desire was to marry the said Lady Mary, whose dowry he assigned to be thirtie two thousand Crownes by yeare, during her naturall life, covenanting further to pay unto King Henry her brother the sum of one hundred thousand Crownes annually for five yeares continuance.

(21) Peace thus concluded, the Lady Mary with an honourable Company was shipped at Dover, the Duke of Norfolke, the Marquesse Dorset, and the Earle of Salisbury, being her chiefe Conductors: whose fleet had not passed two leagues at Seas, but that a sudden tempest arose, and so violently raised the waves, as their Ships were severed each from others, some into Flaunders, some into Callis, and hers with great difficultie strucke in at Bulloigne, where by Boates her traine was landed, and her selfe borne to the shore in the armes of a Knight. Thence with thirtie six Ladies, all their Palfreis trapped in crimson Velvet, embroidered with gold, her selfe all in Cloth of silver, her Horses and Chariots in Tissue-cloth of Gold and Crimson Velvet, set with Goldsmiths worke, more like an Angel then a humane Creature, met with King Lewis at Abuile, and there the ninth of October the marriage was solemnized; where the French so gazed at their new Queenes beautie, as they could not cast their eyes from her attractive rayes, nor the infirme King bee satisfied with any other object whilest she was in presence; for (so saith Guicchardine) he gave himselfe over too much to behold her most excellent beautie, not considering her young yeares, being not yet eighteene, with the unequalitie of his owne expired, nor the constitution of his weake decayed body. For having beene sicke before this his marriage, and not well recovered of his lingring disease, (though he set the fairest shew outward) lived with this his faire Queene only eightie two daies, and then by his death left her to choose another Husband, to her best liking, which she shortly did in her second match.

Wolsey sent to the Emperour.

(22) For, thus left a stranger in the French Court, and desirous to turne againe into England; King Henry her brother, sent Charles Brandon the new made Duke of Suffolke, to conduct the young Queene out of France. The Duke of agallant, and goodly presence, so courted his charge, and carried himselfe in the eye of her melting affections, as his love entred deepely into her tender heart: which thing indeed King Henry perceived before, for which cause, as was thought, he raised him to the grace of a Duke; howsoever the Gemme thus got, and too precious to be lost, he made her his owne, by celebration of marriage before he past Callis, and thence sent to intreat his Soveraignes consent, who seeing it was bootlesse to undoe what was done, with a light touch of reproofe allowed their nuptials. But her dowry kept backe by the French, and other grievances complained of, caused no little troubles betweene the two Realmes, as shall be related in place convenient. In the meane while, let it not seeme over-tedious if we (somewhat extravigant and briefly runne over the rising and height of Thomas Wolsey, that great Statesman and Pontificall Priest, seeing that many dependances of Story had their events in the Acts of this man, who with the King together went as King, if not before him in managing the State.

(23) His birth was at Ipswich in the Countie of Suffolke, his Parents poore, but of an honest report, and himselfe a good Philosopher, very eloquent and full of wit. His education in youth was at Oxford in Maudlin Colledge, and his first preferment from the Lord Marquesse Dorset, who bestowed upon him a Benefice in his gift, in regard that he was Tutor unto his Sonnes; which Sir Amias Paulet so crost him in, that hee tyed Wolsey by the feete in the Stockes, though afterward hee put this his Act among other his deeds, whereof he had just cause to repent: for the Schoolemaster no sooner was mounted into the Chancellor-

Chancellorship of England, but that he laid his command upon Paulet, and retained him as prisoner in the Middle-Temple the space of six yeares. But in the meane time Marquesse Dorset dying, left Wolseys pillar of hope altogether unpolished, and the base thereof it selfe unsetled upon any firme ground: so that Wolsey now fought his fortune in France; who coming to Calis, became servant to Sir Iohn Naphant the Treasurer of that Towne, where he carried himselfe with so great discretion, as shortly his Master preferred him to King Henry the seventh.

Wolsey interteined in the North.

(24) This Scholler having thus cast Anchor at Court, the haven of hope, was more then double diligent in the Kings eye, and very serviceable also both to Doctor Fox Bishop of Winchester, Secretary, and Lord Privie Seale, as also to Sir Thomas Lovell Master of the Wards, and Constable of the Tower: but most of all unto Fortune, that now fitted occasion to make her selfe famous in this poore Butchers sonne. For King Henry the seventh having urgent businesse with Maximilian the Emperour, sent this his Chaplaine unto him in Post; who posted againe, before he was thought to be gone, and withall concluded some points forgot in his directions, to the high content of his Soveraigne Lord the King: for the which he bestowed upon him the Deanry of Lincolne, the worthiest promotion under the degree of a Bishop: then was he made the Kings Almoner, and presently following, one of the Privy Councell; wherein his advise was so wise, and his perswasions so weighty, that he was continually imployed to be their expositor to the King, alwayes carrying a most speciall regard, to preferre his Majesties will howsoever it went; so that his mouth was the onely Organ that ever sounded his pleasure, and freedome from troubles of all State affaires.

Wolsey made Bishop of Tourney, London, and Yorke.

(25) But warres having beene commenced betwixt England and France, and Tournay lost from the obedience of Lewis, King Henry gave his Almoner the Bishopricke thereof, and changed his Deanry of Lincolne into the Bishopricke of the same Dioceese, and not long after set also the Miter of Yorke upon Wolseyes Wise-head: whereby he became (as it were) three Bishops at once, and now being Primas Angliæ, carried himselfe accordingly, by erecting his Crosse in the Kings Court, albeit it were within the Iurisdiction of Canterbury, which seemed unsufferable; for the dignitie of the Church held then much by Precedency of place, and the giving way to inferiours, was accounted the infringing of all religious liberties; Wherfore William Archbishop of Canterbury found himselfe sore agrieved to have the Crosse of Yorke (which owed him obedience) advanced with his, and that in his presence, for which he greatly checked the presumption of this proud Prelate.

(26) But Wolsey not wanting wherewithall to mate him, by the instigations of the Kings, both of England and France; obtained to be made Priest, Cardinall, and Legatus de Latere, unto whom Pope Leo sent a Cardinals Hat, with Bulls of authoritie in that behalfe; yet were these high Presents brought in no better a case, then in a meane budget, which seemeth somewhat disgracefull in the new Cardinals eye; wherefore he commanded a stay to be made of the bringers approach; and for the greater honour to this honourable present, arrayed him in most costly silkes, beseeming so great an Ambassador, who advancing forward, he caused to be encountred by a number of gallant Gentlemen, and a great assembly of Prelates, upon Blacke-heath, by whom he was conducted with much honour through the City of London, and his Present delivered at Westminster, attended by many mytred Bishops and Abbots, with a rich shew of Copes, as if it had beene a Kings Coronation.

Wolsey made Cardinall.

(27) Thus got before Canterbury by his power Legative, to weare now his Hat without controule of an equall, he obtained the Purse with the broad Seale of England, which Archbishop Warham had enjoyed long before the death of King Henry the seventh, and was made Lord Chancellour in his roome; so that besides the Purse and Mace of that honourable Office, he had two Crosses and two Pillars borne ever before him by the tallest Priests that were to be found in the Realme. To the better maintenance of his chargeable estate, the King bestowed on him the Bishopricke of Winchester, and in Commendam the Abbey of Saint Albanes, and with them he held in Farme the Bishoprickes of Bathe, Worcester, and Hereford, enjoyed by strangers incumbents, not residing in the Realme, so that now seeming a monster with seven heads, and each of them crowned with the Miter of a Bishop; let us thus leave him dandled in Dame Fortunes lap, till surfeited with dalliance shee cast him from thence.

(28) But the state of Londons Tradesmen prospered under his greatnesse nothing so well, for such was the concourse of strangers, and so much were they borne with, by the superiours, that they abused the English openly in the markets, kept from a Citizen his owne wife, with his plate, yea, and past with a small pennance for killing an English-man. These first were complained of in a Sermon at Saint Maries Spittle, and after wards assaulted, and much hurt done to their substance and houses, for which riotous offence John Lincolne the onely instigator was hanged; and foure hundred men, boyes, and eleven women led in ropes along the City in their shirts, and halters about the neckes, to the Kings Hall at Westminster, where his Majesty sitting under a cloth of estate, pardoned the offences, to the great rejoycing of the Londoners.

(29) But the losse of Tournay sticking sore upon the stomacke of the French King, hee sought to redeeme it againe with money, and to that end sent his Ambassadors into England, where it was concluded, that the City should be delivered unto Francis Valois then King of France, paying for the same unto Henry five hundred thousand Crownes in twelve yeares continuance, that is to say, fifty thousand Crownes a yeare; that the Duke of Albany should be recalled out of Scotland, and that the Dolphin should marry the Lady Mary King Henries young daughter, which marriage if to it hapned not to take effect at the yeeres of consent, then Tournay should be re-delivered to the English; neither was this forgotten, that the Cardinall should receive a thousand Markes yearely for the revenewes of the said Bishopricke, and upon these Covenants were hostages for further assurance delivered.

Articles of agreement betwixt King Henry and K. Lewis.

(30) But peace much affected among Christian Princes, and daily increased of most potent Estates, was very much feared would worke alteration in the authority, abuse, and great riches of the Clergy, if Kings might have leasure to looke into their owne charges at home. To busie their heads therefore from all suspition or jealousies, Pope Leo the tenth devised the meanes, by a preparation intended for the Holy lands warres; a subject in shew very religious, how soever the former successes had prooved it not pleasing to God, when to recover the City once holy, and to build up that which Christ by prophesie had cast downe, as much Christian bloud was spilt to raze those ruinous wals, as there was morter laid to fasten the stones of their first building.

(31) To this end therefore three Legates were sent from the holy See of Rome, one into France, another into Germany, and Cardinall Campius into England, with whom was joyned Wolsey in Commission, who hearing of the ragged retinue of his fellow-Cardinall, sent store of red cloth unto Callis, to make them meet followers of so great a Lord; and Campius landed at Dover, Wolsey caused the Townes thorow which he should passe, to receive him with procession: and so being brought by the Gentility of Kent unto Blacke-heath, neere unto Greenewich, was there met and received by the Duke of Norfolke, many Knights, but many more Prelates, where in a

(32) Eight Mules he had laden with necessaries belonging, but those made no shew in proud Wolseys eyes, therefore twelve more he sent him to furnish his Pageants through the streets of London; these either wanton, or ashamed to be wondred at, played the skittish Iades indeed: For in Cheape-side, as this Triumph forth-passed, these Beasts by breaking their Collers, and escaping their leaders, cast their Carriages and Coffers upon the cold ground; whose lids flying open, layd most of their riches to the sight of the people. For, from some of them fell olde Breeches, Bootes, and broken shooes; from others, torne stockings, tattered ragges, old Iron and horse-shooes; and for fainting by the way, therein was bestowed, and now cast abroad, broken meat, marow-bones, rosted egges, and crusts of bread, y wisse worth the keeping: this Shipwracke made upon the Shelves of Cheape-side, no need it was to bid the Muliters to bestirre them, who like good thrifty Marriners saved from spoyle as much as they could, and trussing up their trinkets, laded againe these wantons, with the wealth of the Cardinall, who (good man) was jogging on afore with his Crosses, Pillars, Gilt-axe and Mace, unto Pauls Church, where he was met with many mitred Bishops, and attended upon to Bathe place, where we will leave him, and returne to the place where wee left.

(33) The unity agreed upon betwixt England and France, a meeting was motioned for the two Kings, and to that end great preparation made a∫well of the one, as of the other. But in the heat of this busines∫e, King Henry had word that Charles, his Quenes Nephew, and new-made Emperour, would visit him in England, which accordingly hee did, accompanied with the Queene of Arragon, and a most Royall Traine, and was as royally entertained by King Henry: the cau∫e of his comming was to hinder the peace concluded with France, for although this Emperour was young, and but newly e∫tabli∫hed; yet was hee wi∫e, and well-fore saw the hurt that this amity with France would bring him, and therefore came in person of purpo∫e to di∫∫wade the Kings minde, and to ∫tay his entrance with the French if he could, but finding Henry ſo forward in thoſe proceeds, he baited his hookes with golden gifts to the Cardinall, that might doe all with the King, and wanne him wholly to his devotion.

(34) King Henry paſſing the Seas unto Callis, met with King Francis at a place newly built for that purpo∫e, betwixt the Townes of Guiſnes, and Arde: where to∂e∫cribe the Iu∫ts, Banquets, and maskes were to fill up (with Hall, Grafton and Holinſhead) whole ſides of exceſſive great coſt. At Callis alſo the ſame time the Emperour, with his Aunt the Lady Margaret Dutcheſſe of Savoy landed, whither King Henry and his Queene repaired, to the no little grudge of the French King, though he kept it to himſelfe, and conſented unto the ancient league tripartite betwixt theſe three Monarchs, which done, the Kings returned into their owne Realmes.

(35) Diſpleaſures ſhortly ariſing betwixt the Emperour and the French King, King Henry aſſaied to bring them to peace, but that failing, fell himſelf from the French, imputing the fault unto Francis, for ſuborning the Scots againſt him, and King Francis againe laid all the blame in the Cardinall, accuſing him of diſſimulation, abhorred practiſes, and what not? but whereſoever lay the deſect, the Duke of Albany was ſent into Scotland; the French followed a Spaniſh ſhip, fraught with the goods of Engliſh Merchants unto Margate, and tooke her even in the Kings ſtreames, in both which King Francis excuſing himſelfe with ignorance, alleadged, no breach of truce broken by him.

(36) Then was it thought beſt by the Cardinals advice to repay like with like, and therefore counſelled his King to reare Charles Duke of Burbon againſt France, and to perſwade him to invade the very heart thereof, incouraging him with ſufficient pay, and making him his Champion-generall of the Field; whileſt the Emperour likewiſe held him play againſt Millan. And to that end was ſent in way of loane to the Emperour a great ſum of money, and forraigne Princes ſollicited to take Armes againſt France, for effecting which, King Henry ſent his Ambaſſadours to the States of Venice and Swiſſers, with theſe inſtructions as followeth.

Duke Burbon made King Henries Captaine Generall.

(37) That whereas in a treaty of peace it was concluded betwixt the Emperour, King Henry, and Francis the French King, that if any Controverſies ſhould ariſe betwixt any two, the Prince not invading ſhould give aide and aſſiſtance againſt the invader: but now the Emperour being invaded by the French Kings Captaines in the Realme of Navarre, and in his owne Countrey by Robert de la Marck, and others by his procurement, and our King (ſaid they) being often called upon by the Emperour, hath often entreated the French King to ſurceaſe, but hath nothing obtained, beſides faire words and detraction of promiſes. Complaining likewiſe that in the intercourſe of theſe buſineſſes, the French King, contrary to his Oath, had ſent the Duke of Albany into Scotland (in contempt of King Henry) and to the great danger of the young Kings death or depoſition, he being the next in bloud to ſucceed, and to the diſhonour of the Queene-Mother, had cauſed a ſeparation betwixt her and her lawfull Husband the Earle of Angus. That the French King had detained the paiment compounded for the delivery of Tournay; and kept backe the dowry of his Siſter Queene Dowager of France, that he had entertained the rebellious Subjects of King Henry, and ſpoyled his Merchants both by Land and Sea. Neither was unremembred the danger that the Venetians ſtood in, if the Realmes of Naples, and Sicily, the Seigniories of Ieanes, and Millane were loſt from the Empire. Theſe therefore ſeemed faire projects unto King Henry for him to warre againſt France, and to that end a generall Muſter by Commiſſion was taken of all able men from ſixteene yeares and upward, of every Hamlet, Village, Burrough, City, Hundred, and Shire, throughout England, which ſeemed to many another Domeſday-Booke: and yet was there neither peace nor warre againſt France.

(38) In this great and hatty preparation, Charles the Emperour, as he paſſed toward Spaine, landed at Dover, where King Henry met him, and in great eſtate brought him to London; which was ſo prepared with Ornaments and Pageants, as if it had beene the Kings Coronation, and in the Blacke-Friers the Emperour was lodged, in a moſt Princely Pallace, new built by the King; then was he feaſted at Windſore, where he ſate in his ſtate, in his Mantle and Gartar, and by receiving the Sacrament theſe two potents Monarches tooke their corporall Oaths to obſerve the Covenants concluded betwixt them: whereof one was, that the Emperour Charles agreed to ſtay for, and to take to wife the young Princeſſe Lady Mary, King Henries then onely daughter; and in ſuch golden bands of love, Charles and Henry, ſeemed to be linked, as in London this ſentence was ſet up in the Guild-hall over the doore of the Counſell-Chamber, where it ſtill remaineth.

(39) Why the Titles Defender of the Church and Faith, were attributed unto theſe two Princes, is no marvell; for Charles choſen Emperour, was ſcarſly confirmed, but to purchaſe the Popes favour, he directed forth a ſolemne Writ of Out-lawry againſt Martin Luther, who then had given a great blow to the Papall Crowne. renowned in Rome, for writing a Booke againſt the ſaid Luther: under-propping the tottering or down-caſt countenance of the Popes pardons; which Luther ſhrewdly had ſhaken; the Pope therefore to ſhew himſelfe a kinde father unto thoſe his ſonnes, gave them theſe Titles; which in truth were none other, then the ſame which they ſware unto, when the Crownes of their Empires were firſt ſet upon their heads. But with what acceptance his Holineſſe received King Henries booke, his owne Oration ſolemnely made at the delivery thereof unto M. John Clarke the preſenter, and Kings Ambaſſador, in his Conſiſtory, and in the preſence of his Cardinals, ſufficiently doth ſhew, the tranſlation whereof we have inſerted as we finde it in the Originall it ſelfe.

"We doe receive this booke with all alacrity: it is "indeed ſuch as there could not be any thing ſent us, "and our venerable Brethren, more acceptable then it "is. For the King himſelfe, a moſt mighty, moſt pru-"dent, and moſt truely Chriſtian Prince, wee know "not whether we may more praiſe or admire, being "the firſt that by war, with happy ſucceſſe, hath ſub-"dued the enemies of the Church of Chriſt, that "ſeeke to rend Chriſts coat, and at laſt overcomming "the enemies, hath reſtored peace to the Church of "God, and to this holy See. But now againſt ſo foule "a Monſter, both to underſtand, to be able, and wil-"ling to write this booke, he hath ſhewed himſelfe "no more admirable to the whole world for his ele-"gant ſtyle, then for his wit. We humbly give thanks "to our Creator, for giving ſuch a Prince to defend "his Church, and this holy See, deſiring the ſame "God to grant to this his King a happy life, and all "his deſires, and after this life in his heavenly King-"dome, to keep for him an everlaſting Crowne. And "we ſo farre as we are able to entreat of God, will "never be wanting to the ſaid moſt wiſe King in the "faculties granted to us of God.

(40) To manifeſt which his readineſſe, himſelfe among his Cardinals decreed an augmentation unto King Henries royall Style, to be annexed unto his others; cofirming the ſame by his Bull, which that it periſh not by the devouring teeth of Time, wee have here publiſhed from the originall Parchment, and Leaden ſeale it ſelfe, as followeth.

(41) Leo Epiſcopus, ſervus ſervorum Dei, &c. Leo Biſhop, ſervant of the ſervants of God; To our moſt dearely beloved Sonne in Chriſt, Henry King of England, Defender of the Faith, health and Apoſtolicall Benediction. We by divine permiſſion, the chiefe overſeer for the government of the univerſall Church, though inſufficient for ſo great a worke, doe powre forth the cogitations of our heart, that the Catholike faith, without which no man can attaine to ſalvation, may receive continuall increaſe, and that thoſe good lawes and conſtitutions decreed by the wiſedome and learning of ſuch as are in authority, eſpecially the faithfull in Chriſt, for reſtraining the attempts of all that labour to oppreſſe the ſame, or by wicked lyes and fictions ſeeke to pervert and obſcure it, may proſper with perpetuall increaſe, doe beſtow our paines and utmoſt endeavour in our office and Miniſtery. And like as the Romane Biſhops our predeceſſors, were woont to ſhew eſpecial favour to Catholike Princes (according as the quality of matters and times required) eſpecially to them that in troubleſome times, when the madneſſe and perfidious dealing of Schiſmatikes and heretikes moſt of all abound, did abide conſtant and unmoveable, not onely in ſoundneſſe of faith and pure devotion to the holy Romane Church, but alſo as the moſt legitimate ſonnes and valiant Champions of the ſame, oppoſed themſelves both with mind and body againſt the furious madneſſe of Schiſmatikes and heretikes: ſo likewiſe alſo doe we deſire to extoll your Majeſty with worthy and immortall praiſes, for your high and immortall deſerts and labours towards us, and this holy See, wherein by Gods permiſſion wee ſit, to grant unto it thoſe things for which it ought to watch, and drive away the Wolves from the Lords flocke, and to cut off with the materiall ſword rotten members, which infect the myſticall body of Chriſt, and to confirme the hearts of the faithfull in ſoundneſſe of beliefe. Now, where of late our beloved ſonne John Clarke your Majeſties Orator with us, being in our Conſiſtory before our venerable Brethren of the holy Romane Church, the Cardinals and many other Prelates of the ſame, exhibited a Booke unto us to be examined and allowed of us, which Booke your Majeſties ſelfe (who doth all things with diligence, and nothing amiſſe) enflamed with charity and zeale to the Catholike faith, and with ardent devotion toward us, and this holy See, hath compoſed, as a moſt worthy and ſoveraigne Antidote againſt the errors of divers heretikes, often condemned by this holy See, and of late ſtirred up and brought in by Martin Luther: And your ſaid Orator hath alſo largely declared unto us, that your Majeſty is ready, and purpoſeth, like as you have confuted the notorious errors of the ſaid Martin, by true reaſon and invincible authorities of ſacred Scripture, and ancient Fathers, ſo you will puniſh to the uttermoſt of your power, all thoſe of your whole Kingdome, that ſhall preſume to follow, or defend them: and we have diligently and exactly peruſed and viewed the admirable doctrine of your ſaid Booke, watered with the dewe of heavenly grace, and doe heartily thanke Almighty God, from whom every good and perfect gift doth come, who hath vouchſafed to inſpire your Noble mind, inclined to every good thing, and to endue you with ſo great grace from heaven, as to write thoſe things, wherby you are able to defend his holy faith, againſt ſuch a new Innouator of damned errors; and alſo incite by your example all other Chriſtian Kings and Princes, to be willing to favour and further with all their beſt aydes the Orthodoxall faith, and Evangelicall truth, whenſoever it be brought into danger or doubt. And wee thinke it alſo meete, that they who have undertaken ſuch godly labours for the defence of the faith of Chriſt, ſhould have all praiſe and honour of us; and wee are deſirous, that not only the things themſelves which your Majeſtie hath written, being both of moſt ſound doctrine, and no leſſe eloquence, ſhould be extolled and magnified with condigne commendations, and allowed and confirmed by our authority; but alſo that your Majeſty ſhould bee graced with ſuch an honour, and ſuch a Title, as that both for our time, and ever hereafter, all men might perceive how gratefull and acceptable this gift of your Majeſties hath beene unto us, eſpecially offered unto us now at this time. Wee, who be the true ſucceſſors of Peter, whom Chriſt at his aſcenſion into heaven left his Vicar on earth, and to whom he committed the care of his flocke: We, I ſay, who ſit in this holy ſeate, from which all dignities and titles doe flow, upon mature deliberation had with our ſaid Brethren about theſe things, have by the generall agreement and conſent of them decreed, to beſtow upon your Majeſty this Title, namely, THE DEFENDER OF THE FAITH. And accordingly by theſe preſents doe inſtile you with ſuch a title, commanding all faithfull Chriſtians that they name your Majeſtie with this Title, and when they write to you, that after the word KING, they adjoyne DEFENDER OF THE FAITH. And truely, wee diligently conſidering and weighing your ſingular merits, were not able to bethinke us of a name more worthy and convenient for your Majeſtie, then the excellency and dignity of this Title, which ſo often as you ſhall heare and reade, ſo often you may call to minde this your ſingular vertue and great deſert; nor may you by this Title puffe up your ſelfe in pride, but according to your wonted prudence become more humble, and bee more valiant and conſtant in the faith of Chriſt, and in devotion to this holy See, by which you have beene exalted, rejoycing in the Lord the giver of all good things, leaving this as a perpetuall and immortall monument of your glory to your children, ſhewing them the way unto the like, that if they ſhall deſire to be graced alſo with ſuch a Title, they muſt labour to doe ſuch workes, and to follow the excellent steps of your Majestie, whom, accordingly as you have well deserved of us, and this said See, together with your wife, and all your Children that shall be borne of you, or of them, we blesse with our Benediction, with a large and liberall hand, in the name of HIM, from whom the power of granting this blessing is given unto us, praying and beseeching that Almighty One, who saith, By me Kings raigne, and Princes rule, and in whose hands are the hearts of Kings, *that hee will confirme your Majesty in your holy purpose, and encrease your devotion, and by your worthy endeavours for the sacred faith, so to illustrate your renowme, and make you glorious through all the world, that this our Testimony which wee have given of you, adorning you with so excellent a Title, may never be judged by any to be false or vaine. Lastly, we desire God, that after this life ended, he would make you partakers of his eternall glory. (42) But from these Priestly and Papall gratulations, let us returne to leade our Story unto temporall Princes affaires. How the Emperour Charles had beene entertained in King Henries Court, wee have said, and now ready to depart with many rich gifts, hee repaired to Southampton, where hee tooke his Ships for Spaine, whose conductor through the narrow Seas was Thomas Earle of Surrey, Lord high Admirall of England, who having wafted him unto Biscay, with a gallant crew of Gentlemen, made thence saile into France, and in Britaine besieged and wonne the strong Towne Morleis, and with the Garrison Souldiers of the Marches dayly bickered with the heart burning French, and dayly went away with the better, but new stirres arreared by the Scots, the Lord Admirall was recalled, and came to the Court, where he declared to his Highnesse what hee had done in Britaine.

The Lord Admirall winneth Morleis.

(43) King Henries businesse thus on foot in France, hee thought to pursue it with all the advantage hee could, and first to finde the Scots play, who were ever fast friends to the French, he sent the Lords Rosse and Dacres to secure the North-borders, appoynting for his Lieutenant in those parts the Earle of Shrewsbury, and sent the Lord Admirall of England againe into France, who divided his Army into three Battalions; the first whereof, was led by Robert Ratcliffe, Lord Fitzwater; the Middle, the Earle conducted himselfe, with the assistance of his Brother Lord Edmund Howard; and the Rereward was governed by Sir William Sands, and Sir Richard Wingfield, both of them Knights of the Order, the Colonell of the horse was Sir Edward Guilford.

The Earle of Shrewsbury Lieutenant of the North, Lord Admirall sent againe into France.

(44) These in September entred into the French Pale, and made toward the Castle of Heding, unto whom joyned the Burgundians, sent from the Lady Margaret then Regent of Flanders, under whose colours served many Spaniards; Surrey thus set forward, burned all things where hee came, demolishing the Castles and Townes of Sellios, Brumbridge, Senekerk, Botingham, Manstier, Nerbins, Daverne, Culumberge and Fringes the Towne and Churches fortified of Boards, Vaus, and Saint Mary de Bois: but laying his siege against Heding, was forced for want of battering peeces, to breake up againe, and depart: In whose returne he burnt the Townes and Castles of Dorlens and Darrier, and comming to Calis, set saile for England with a wonderfull great Booty.

(45) In this while the Duke of Albanie being made Governour of Scotland, with an Army of fourescore thousand drew unto the Borders, whence he sent into France for sixe thousand Almains, which were promised, and dayly expected though in vaine, for none came at all. The Earle of Shrewsbury with eight and twenty thousand strong, drew likewise towards the Borders, but the Scots lying still, without further invasion, an abstinence from warre was betwixt them concluded, which how the English kept, the sequell well shewed; for the King ordaining Henry Percy Earle of Northumberland, Lord Warden of the whole Marches, hee either refrained to impeach his honour by breach of truce, or else loath to be disquieted of his soft rest, made meanes to the King, to be discharged of the office, which was forthwith bestowed (and thankefully accepted) upon Thomas Earle of Surrey, lately returned out of France, who delivered the charge of the East and Middle-Marches unto the Lord Marquesse Dorset, and the West unto the Lord Dacres, who presently made a roade into Scotland, and returned with booty.

(46) France and Scotland thus assailed at once, a Parliament was assembled at Blacke-Fryers in London, wherein Cardinall Wolsey moved, and with much adoe obtained, the halfe of the yearely revenewes of all spirituall livings, to be payd for five yeares continuance, and the tenth part of all temporall substance to maintaine this great charge of the King, for the exact collection whereof the Cardinall was so forward, as he moved, and would have had every man sworne for his wealth, had not the Citizens of London utterly refused it, which when the King heard of, he was highly displeased with Wolsey, and said, that ere long he would looke to things himselfe without any Substitute.

(48) King Henry purposing his further pursuits, sent a great Army into France, under the leading of the Duke of Suffolke Charles Brandon, attended upon by the Lords Montacute, Herbert, Ferrers, Marney, Sands, Barkley and Powis, nineteene Knights, six hundred demi-Lances, two hundred Archers horsed, three thousand more of them on foot, five thousand Bill-men, and seaventeene hundred Garrison Souldiers, with one thousand five hundred labourers and Pioners. These departing Calis, first besieged, and wanne Bell-Castell, and then entring Picardy, there joyned unto him three thousand foot, and five hundred horse of Almans and Spaniards; with these hee assailed, and tooke the Castle of Bounegard, wherein hee put Garrison, wanne Braye, Roie, Libome, Montdedier and Boghan: but the winter come on, and the weather extreame in wets and frosts, besides other wants ever following the Winters Warriers, the Duke was enforced to breake up the Campe; and from Calis came safely to the Court, where, unto King Henry hee vvas very vvelcome, but much more unto the French Queene his Wife.

(49) The Scottish (as vve have said) keeping the Borders, and the English making inroades, where the places were vveakest, the stirres betvvixt them began dayly to increase. In so much as the Duke of Albany sent a Herauld unto the Earle of Surrey, the Kings Lieutenant of the North, to offer him Battell, promising on his honour if hee tooke him prisoner, his ransome should be easie, and his person courteously dealt vvith; vvho returned as rough an answvere, as the offer was kinde, saying, he would abide Battell if he durst give it, and if the Duke were taken either by him or his, he would strike off his head and send it for a present to his Master the King of England. So netled was the Earle against the French, that had raised Albany thus against England, and King Henry (as Bishop Lesly reporteth) tooke from the Scots in habiting England all their goods, sending them into their Countrey on foote, with white Crosses sewed upon their uppermost Garments, by which they were knowne and suffered to passe. The Scots upon the Earles answere were wounderfully enraged, and seeking the revenge, some of them passed over the water, and hotly besieged the Castle of Warke, which the Englishmen as valiantly defended, and in their resistance slew almost three hundred of their French Souldiers, the Scots retyring againe to their Campe,

More losse by warre, then gotten by victory.

(50) The Regent not able to digest the Earles pill, commanded his Army to march forward into the English Marches, wherewith the common Souldiers much rejoyced, but the wiser of the Nobility urged this in their Counsell, that having displayed in warlike manner, their Banners upon the Verge of the Borders, and defended their Countrey from the spoile, they saw no great reason further to proceed, no necessity or cause moving, besides the quarrell of the French: and thereupon repayring to the Regent, they demanded why they should proceed further, alleadging that at his commandement (yea and that willingly) they had so farre passed, for the defence of their Countrey, which was sufficient without further invasion of the others, the time so Inconvenient in the nonage of their young King, and the action so dangerous, wherein all the Peeres of Scotland were assembled, to attend and suffer the doubtfull issue of warre, which ever is uncertaine, and more losse in one battell many times suffered, then gaine can be gotten in many: whereof too too lamentable experience (said they) wee have had by King Iames, that by peace and life, brought Scotland to her best, but by his warre and death almost to the worst, therefore would wee know (said the Nobility) whether this your intent stands with the weale of the King and us, or else is profecuted in the cause of your selfe, and the French?

The Duke of Albanies answere.

(51) The Duke making some pause, lastly replyed, and said; "This question would have beene "demanded ere now: for well you know, that from "Scotland I beare my name, honour and lineage, "have passed the Seas from the noble Realme of "France for the love of my Countrey, to set you in "amity which were at dissention, by whose division "your Realme lay prostrate to destruction and Con"queſt, for whose ayde you see I have procured the "French to joyne with you against the English. A"gaine, when these warres were determined by Par"liament, you made me your Captaine, authorizing "me to invade England with Banner displayed, then "was no question or demand of the cause; neither "have I entred the quarrell without your agree"ment; and therefore may I justifie my present do"ings, and yet to me it seemeth there is cause sufficient, with fire, sword and bloud to enter England, "if wee be not too forgetfull, and will submit our "selves to dishonour and reproach: for we all know "that the Realme of Scotland is ours by inheri"tance, and that portion of the world allowed to "our Nation to enjoy; how can we warre better, "then to maintaine our naturall inheritance, against "which the English give daily attempts, with man"slaughter, murthers, thefts and spoyles; have we not "then (thinke you) just cause to make warre? The de"fence of a kingdome, is the office of a King, the ho"nour of the Noble, the service of the Souldier, and "the duty of a naturall Subject. But be it as you "will, yet having so puissant an army to avoide our "owne reproach, and encouragement of the Ene"mie, let us campe here still on the Borders till we "see what the Englishmen intend.

(52) But Margaret Queene of Scots solliciting her brother for a peace, these stirres brake up for a time, as those in France did shortly after, by the working wit of Cardinall Wolsey, who in the State affaires was ever one, which made him the more emulated, and the grievances of the Commons ever cast upon him; in so much that it was commonly spoken hee was the causer of the heavy imposition granted to maintaine the Kings warres, which was so importable to the poorer sort of Subjects, as the payment thereof was utterly denyed to the appoynted Collectors, with weepings, curſings, and great acclantsions; yea, and almost grew to an open Rebellion: for Kent denied it to the Lord Cobham: Essex refused to commune with the Commiſſioners: Huntingtonshire resisted, and would not heare them: London would be taxt by none but by their Aldermen: and Suffolke rose up in Armes, making Poverty their Captaine. Of these stirres when King Henry heard, hee had great indignation, blaming the Counsellors, and wrote his Letters unto every County, that no such demands should be payd: and the Cardinal to curry favour with the Commons gave it forth forsooth, that at his intercession the Offenders were pardoned, and the money remitted.

(53) And now more to shew his owne power, then any great cause; hee beganne to alienate the heart of King Henry against his Nephew the Emperour, and caused him to with-hold pay from the Duke of Burbon his late made Generall: which was the cause of the French Kings Captivity. For Burbon imcamped within the Towne of Pauia, and besieged by the French in most warlike manner, was for want of his said pay so desperate of life, that he attempted a most dangerous escape. In the dead of the night he set a part of his company to assaile the enemy on that side of the Towne which was least strong, himselfe issuing secretly out of a Posterne on the contrary side. The watch but slender, and the Souldiers asleepe, a great terror arose, in which the besiegers turned their Ordonance to the place of the cry, when as suddenly Burbon was at their backes, and winning their Ordonance, discharged them against their owners, slew their Souldiers, cut downe their Tents, and by the Vice-roye of Naples was the French King taken prisoner in the field.

(54) This fortunate succesſe made these Almaines more bolde, who presently with the Imperiall Ensignes marched towards Florence, and thence to Rome, unto whose walls in one day they gave three assaults, in the last whereof Charles Duke of Burbon their Generall was slaine; notwithstanding the City was taken and sacked; Pope Clement in the meane while, to make all sure as he thought, thundred out his Curses, and with Bell, Booke, and Candle, committed those Lutherans to Hell; who nevertheleſſe broke down that windy Bulwarke, and with great slaughter forced him with twenty three Cardinals, into the Castle of Saint Angello, where they kept them besieged from the sixt of May, unto the tenth of December: in which time, in mockage of the Pope, the Souldiers to make solace did often apparell one in Pontificall attire, who sometime should blesse them, and sometime accurse them, and riding on Horse-backe with a Whore set behinde him, should so passe the streets, that the Pope & Cardinals might see him. These contumelies and Papall Captivities were grievously taken by many Christian Princes, insomuch that Cæsar in Spaine forbad all Enterludes to be playde, and Pageants prepared for joy of the birth of his Sonne Prince Philip, to be pulled downe. In France by the Court of Parliament the Duke of Burbon was condemned of Treason, his name and memoriall accursed, his Armes puld downe, and his Lands and goods confiscated; neither would King Henrie of England answere the Emperours Letters, wherein he excused himselfe from having any hand in the action.

Troubles in Ireland.

(55) Whileſt theſe things were in working at Rome, aroſe great troubles in Ireland, the Kerns caſting off all obedience, and killing the Kings ſubjects where they found them: againſt whom Thomas Howard Earle of Surrey, Lord Lieutenant of that kingdome, made forth his power, and followed them himſelfe with ſuch danger of life, that the viſor of his Helmet was ſhot off, as hee purſued the enemy through the deſert woods: but theſe Rebels cut off by his high valour, and warres proclaimed at one time againſt Scotland and France, the Lord Lieutenant was recalled into England; and Piers Butler Earle of Oſorie made Deputy of Ireland in his ſtead; betwixt whom, and Girald Fitz-Girald Earle of Kildare, whoſe ſiſter hee had married, aroſe no little ſtrife and debate, which grew to that height as King Henry ſent Commiſſioners to trie and examine the differences, which was ſo cleared on Kildares behalfe, that Oſorie was diſcharged of his Office, and the Lord Fitz-Girald ſworne Deputy in his place; whereat Cardinal Wolſey (whoſe hand chiefly ſteered all ſtate affaires, a deadly enemy to the Earle of Kildare) was highly offended, and to undermine the foundations of this his new Government, gave eare unto Oſorie, who accuſed the new Deputy of many miſdemeanours, among which theſe were the principall; that he winked at Deſmonds eſcape, whom he ſhould have attached by order from the King: that he grew over-familiar with the native Iriſh; and that he put to death the Kings beſt Subjects: for theſe the Lord Deputy was commaunded into England, in whoſe abſence Oſorie, his enemy, was againe choſen Lord Deputy by the Kings Councell, but himſelfe none of the wiſeſt for politike Government, was altogether therein ruled by his Wife, and ſhe made it no courteſie to abuſe her Husbands honour againſt her naturall brother Kildare, who now in England muſt anſwere his demeanour before the Lords of the Councell, and to their Table was he brought, where the Cardinall, Lord Chancellor, made his faults nothing leſſe, and thus addreſſed himſelfe againſt the Earle of Kildare.

The Cardinals ſpeech at the Councell Table againſt Kildare.

" (56) I wot well (my Lord) that I am not the " meereſt at this boord to charge you with theſe
" treaſons, becauſe it hath pleaſed ſome of your " Pew-fellowes to report, that I am a profeſſed ene" my to all Nobility, and namely to the Giraldines:
" but ſeeing every ſhrewd boy can ſay as much when " he is controuled, and theſe points ſo weighty, that " they ſhould not be diſſembled of us; and ſo appa-
" rant that they cannot be denied of you: I muſt
" have leave (notwithſtanding your ſtale ſlander) to " bee the mouth of theſe honourable Lords at this " preſent, and to trumpe your treaſons in your way, " howſoever you take me. Firſt you remember, how " the lewd Earle of Deſmond your kinſeman (who " paſſeth not whom he ſerveth, might he change his " Maſter) ſent his Confederates with Letters of cre" dence unto Francis the French King: and having
" but cold comfort there, went to Charles the Em-
" perour, proffering the helpe of Munſter, and Co-
" naught, towards the Conqueſt of Ireland, if either " of them would helpe to win it from our King. How " many Letters, what precepts, what meſſages, what " threats, have beene ſent you to apprehend him,
" and yet not done? Why ſo? Forſooth I could not " catch him? Nay, nay Earle, forſooth you would " not watch him: If hee be juſtly ſuſpected, why " are you partiall in ſo great a charge? If not, why " are you fearefull to have him tryed? Yea, for it " will be ſworne and depoſed to your face, that for " feare of meeting him, you have winked wilfully,
" ſhunned his ſight, altered your courſe, warned
" your friends, ſtopped both eares and eies, againſt
" his deteſtors, and whenſoever you rooke upon you " to hunt him out, then was he ſure afore-hand to be " out of your walke. Surely, this jugling and falſe
" play, little became either an honeſt man, called to " ſuch honour, or a Nobleman put in ſo great truſt:
" had you loſt but a Cow or a Horſe of your owne,
" two hundred of your retainers would have come
" at your Whiſtle to reſcue the prey from the utter-" moſt edge of Viſter: all the Iriſh in Ireland muſt
" have given you the way. But in purſuing ſo need-
" full a matter as this was; merciſull God, how " nice, how dangerous, how wayward have you " beene? One while he is from home, and another
" while he keepeth home, ſometimes fled, ſometimes
" in the Borders, where you dare not venture. Y-
" wiſſe, my Lord, there be ſhrewd bugges in the bor" ders, for the Earle of Kildare to feare; the Earle,
" nay the King of Kildare: for when you are diſpo-
" ſed, you raigne more like, then rule in the Land:
" where you are pleaſed, the Iriſh foe ſtandeth for a
" juſt Subject: hearts and hands, lives and lands
" are all at your courteſie: who fawneth not thereon,
" cannot reſt within your ſmell, and your ſmell ſo
" rancke, that you track them out at pleaſure. Whileſt the Cardinall was ſpeaking, the Earle chafed and changed colour, and at laſt brake out, and interrupted him thus.

Kildare interrupteth the Cardinals tale.

" (57) My Lord Chancellor, I beſeech you par" don me, I am ſhort-witted, and you I perceive in" tend a long tale: if you proceed in this order, halfe
" my purgation will be loſt for lack of carriage: I have " no Schoole-trickes, nor art of memory: except you
" heare me while I remember your words, your ſe" cond proceſſe will hammer out the former. The Lords aſſociate, who for the moſt part tenderly loved Kildare, and knew the Cardinal his manner of taunts ſo ready, being inured therewith many yeares together, humbly beſought his grace to charge him directly with particulars, and to dwell in ſome one matter untill it were examined throughly.

The Lords intercede for Kildare.

" (58) That granted: It is good reaſon (quoth the " Earle) that your Grace beare the mouth of this
" boord: but my Lord, thoſe mouthes that put theſe

" ſhall reſemble a ſcarre-Crow, or a man of ſtraw
" that ſeemeth at a bluſh to carry ſome proportion,
" but when it is felt and peized, diſcovereth a vanity
" ſerving onely to feare Crowes: and I verily truſt
" your Honours ſhall ſee the proofe by the thing it

" more then my good Brother of Oſorie, who, not-" withſtanding his high promiſes, having alſo the " Kings power, is yet content to bring him in at lea" ſure? Cannot the Earle of Deſmond ſhift, but I
" muſt be of Councell? Cannot he hide him except
" I winke? If he be cloſe, am I his mate? If he be frien-" ded, am I a traitor? This is a doubty kinde of accu" ſation which they urge againſt me, wherein they " are gravelled and mired at my firſt denial. You " would not ſee him (ſay they): who made them ſo
" familiar with mine eie-ſight? Or, when was the " Earle within my view? Or, who ſtood by when " I let him ſlip? Or, where are the tokens of my " wilfull hudwinke? But you ſent him word to " beware of you: who was the meſſenger? Where " are the Letters? Convince my negatives, ſee how " looſe this idle geare hangeth together. Deſmond is " not taken: well, you are in fault: why? Becauſe you " are: who proveth it? No body: What Conje-

" them off by the knees.

At theſe girds the Lord Chancellor much fretted, and finding Kildare to be no Babe, deferred the hearing of his cauſe, till more proofes were produced from Ireland; then in a great fume he aroſe from the Counſell board, and committed the Earle unto priſon, againſt the minds of moſt at the Table, who knew well, that this his accuſation was more of hatred borne by the Cardinall; then any occaſion given by the accuſed late Deputy. Whereupon Thomas Duke of Norfolke ſtept to the King, and craved that Kildare might be his priſoner, offering to be bound in goods and body for his forth-comming, whom he obtained, though with no great liking of the Lord Chancellor, who daily entertained new plaints againſt him, till at laſt he preſſed him fore with letters ſent to Oneale, and Oconor, to encourage their rebellions againſt Oſorie the Lord Deputie; which letters were brought them by his own daughter and their ſiſters, the Lady Alice Fitz-Girald, wife to the Baron of Slane.

Kildare committed to priſon.

(59) This preſumption being vehement, the King ſuſpitious, the Cardinall eager, and his friends faint, Kildare was ſent to the Tower, where he committed himſelfe to God, and expected daily his death, but with ſuch couragious reſolution, as hee being in play with the Lieutenant at ſlide-groat, when the Mandate was brought for his execution on the next Morning, and ſeeing the Lieutenant ſtrucke into a ſudden ſadneſſe; by Saint Bride, Lieutenant (quoth the Earle) there is ſome madde game in that ſcrowle; but fall how it will, this throw is for a huddle: and when the worſt was told him, now I pray thee (quoth he) doe no more but learne aſſuredly from the Kings owne mouth, whether his Highneſſe bee witting thereto or no; the Lieutenant loving his priſoner well, repayred to the King, and ſhewed him the Cardinals warrant, who then controuled the fawcineſſe of the Prieſt (for thoſe were his termes) and gave the Lieutenant his Signet for a counter-maund, whereat the Cardinal ſtormed, but Kildare delivered from his eminent death, and not long after from his impriſonment alſo, was ſent into Ireland, where, at his entrance into Dublin, he was met with a ſolemne proceſſion, and ſo brought into the Citie; ſo well beloved was this Earle abroad, and at home.

(60) But the French Kings fortunes were nothing ſo good, who was ſtraitly impriſoned at Madrill in Spaine, and great ſuite was made for his deliverance, which notwithſtanding would not be heard. The Queene-Mother, then Regent of France, wife of herſelfe, and forwarded by others, ſaw no better meanes to free her ſonne the King, then to enter amity with England, which to accompliſh, the ſolicited King Henry; working upon the occaſions then miniſtred, which was ſome unkindneſſe growne betwixt the Engliſh King, and the Emperour, the one of them more ſtrange by the greatneſſe of his fortunes, and the other in jelouſie of leſſening renowne. The ſparks of which Cinders were ſtirred to flame, by Wolſey, that ever was in the care of the King: alleadging his potency, ſo much eſteemed of all Chriſtian Princes (a found very tunable in King Henries wide eare) would be leſſe regarded by the Emperors late victory; who now began to carry himſelfe with another reſpect, & never after that victory gotten ſubſcribed his Letters to King Henry, according to his accuſtomed manner, Your Sonne and Cozen; but to the draught of his Secretaries, inſixed his hand with the word Charles, and no more.

possession, or facily might be at his command, having likewise the lower parts thereof, as the Countries of Artoys, Flanders, Zeland, Holland, Brabant, Henault, and others; from the which also a direct passage lay unto the Dutchie of Burgoine, Averne, and Burbon, besides the Realmes of Castile, Arragon, Granad, Galice, Asturia, Perpynyon, Rusſillon, and other parts of Spaine; whereupon hee with some other Princes complained, and sought the French Kings deliverance, which when it was gotten, King Francis acknowledged Henry next under God to bee the onely meanes: * but was so slacke in performance of Covenants, that when the Emperour sent to have them accomplished, hee with unprincely termes returned the answere, with challenge of combate, which when the Emperour had accepted, hee shrunke backe, and made meanes of a league.

* Sleidan. com. lib. 9.

(62) But howsoever the unconstancy of our King Henry hath beene blanched forth, for not holding himselfe in his leagues and covenants of amity with other Princes; yet the cause being so as some have observed, there were occasions given as well as opportunity taken: for Charles the Emperour, contrary to covenant, received Grancetor a trayterous Rebell, condemned by Parliament, whom hee refused to deliver, though the King made earnest suit for the man. Moreover, by his Ambassadors in a Treaty of perpetuall peace, holden at Windsor-Castle, the nineteenth of Iune, and fourteenth of King Henries raigne; it was concluded that Charles the Emperour should contract the young Princes the Lady Mary, and take her to his Wife, when shee came to able yeares, which (as Holinshead saith) himselfe sought, at his being in England, promising to remaine unmarried, till that Princesse had past her Minority, and againe before the battell of Pavia, (the now growne unto sixe yeares of age) sent his Ambassadors to have her stiled Empresse, and to be made Governesse of the Low-Countries; all this notwithstanding after that victory against the French King, he began to re-call, and to make small account of that match, pretending the desire of his Subjects to have an heire of his body, which for long time he could not by Lady Mary; but rather as the English judged, the cause was the money received in loane from King Henry, whereby (as hee thought) the greatest part of her portion was already paide; and the Emperours wants being great, * Isabel the sister of Portugall was much affected: with whom plenty of gold was expected, and great liberality offered by the Emperials in desire to have an Empresse of their owne Nation.

The Emperors excuse for not taking Lady Mary to wife.

(63) Besides, against this marriage with Mary, his Counsell of Spaine also excepted, alleadging her to be begot of his brothers wife, whereby her legitimation might be called in question, as also the issue of her body, which they in their wisdom thought meet to prevent; these (no doubt) were the causes that the negotiation of these two Potentates grew daily more desperate. And for his falling off from the French King, These occasions may well be alleadged.

Lady Maries legitimation called in question.

(64) That whereas it had beene covenanted at the marriage of Lady Mary unto King Lewis departed this life, one hundred thousand Crownes should be paid to King Henry, and thirty two thousand Crownes yearely for her Dowry, during terme of life; both which notwithstanding were retained and kept backe unpaide. 2 That the said French King had listned unto Cardinall Poole, who was sent to him from the Pope to stirre warres against England. 3 That contrary to his Covenant hee had entred alliance with the House of Medicis, and had married his daughter Magdalen unto Iames the fift King of Scotland, then an hostile enemie unto King Henry. 4 That he had made suit to match his second sonne Henry Duke of Orleance, with Lady Mary the onely then heire apparant of England, which when it came to conclusion, was put in suspence by Anthonie Veſcie, one of his French Commissioners, who then made doubt whether the maeriage of her mother being wife to the Kings owne brother, could be dispensed with, or the children begot in this second bed, legitimate, or by law allowed to succeed in the throne.

Acts and Mon. pag. 1239.

Objection of the French for Lady Maries legitimation.

(65) These considerations no doubt drew the King to be unconstant to them that were unconstant in themselves, and the question of Lady Maries legitimation served such doubts in his melting conscience, as never after could be made solide: whereof Doctor Longland, his Confessor, is said to be the first man which told the King that his marriage was unlawfull, unto whose opinion other great Clerkes did likewise consent; whereupon a rumour ran that the King would be divorced from the Queene, and the occasion thereof altogether cast vpon the Cardinall of Yorke, in displeasure taken against the Emperour, unto whom hee had beene suiter for the Archbishopricke of Toledo; whereof failing, hee revenged his spleene upon his innocent Aunt Queene Katherine, in moving the King to cast her off, and to become Suiter unto the Dutchesse of Alenzon, sister unto the French King; these Rumors King Henry himselfe forbad; but with no better syccesse then was the report of Queene Annes death, the wife of the Vsurper; both events following before the mouthes of these Relaters could be stopped; unto which lamentable accident my penne must now enter.

King Henrie marriage called in question.

(67) This match was made by King Henry the seaventh, and Ferdinando of Spaine their Parents, Prince Henry having then attained but to ten yeares of age, and when he came to fourteene, proscribed against it, as by a deede under his owne hand, I have heare inserted, the tenour hereof faithfully translated of of Latine, is thus as followeth:

Prince Henry disclaimeth his contract.

In the Name of God, Amen. In the presence of you Reverend Father and Lord in Christ, Lord Richard by the Grace of God, and See Apostolicke, Bishop of Winchester. I Henry Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earle of Chester doe say, affirme, and by these Writings declare; that although in the time of my Minority, and when I was under yeares of marriage, I absolutely contracted Matrimony with the most vertuous Lady Katherine, daughter of the King of Spaine, and although also the said Contract by reason of my being under age, doth now appeare of it selfe insufficient, weake, and of no force, vigour, or efficacie: yet forasmuch as that now I come to perfect yeares, and that thereby the said Contract may peradventure be thought and seeme by silent consent, mutuall abode in one house, by giving and receiving gifts and tokens, or by any other way whatsoever, to be apparently sufficient, and confirmed: Therefore I Henry Prince of Wales, doe here protest, and make knowne to all men that I intend not to approve, ratifie, or confirme in any sort this pretended contract by any thing that I have said, or shall say, have done, or shall doe: but doe at this present renounce the same, freely, and of mine owne accord, unconstrained either by force, fraud, entreaty, or any way else, and I deny it, and wholly purpose and intend quite to relinquish this pretended contract of Matrimony by the best wayes and meanes that by Law more fully, effectually, and sufficiently I may, or shall be able to doe: and expressly doe disavow the same, according as by these presents I doe disclaime it, and disavow it; and I protest that I nei-

The King re-lieth the Queenes bed.

I neither will nor intend to consent unto the said Contract, or unto the said Lady Katherine as my espousall or wife, by any word, deed, act, or gesture to be spoken, done, performed, or acted by me, or in my name, by any whomsoever, whensoever, or howsoever for the time to come. In witnesse whereof I desire, require, entreat, and adjure you all to give testimony hereunto.

By me Henry Prince of Wales.

The above-written protestation was reade and made by the aforesaid Noble Prince Lord Henry, in the presence of the Reverend Father and Lord in Christ the Lord Richard, by divine permission, Bishop of Winchester sitting judiciously in his Court; and I the Notary underwritten, at that time present, the writer of his Acts in this behalfe appointed, and in the presence of the undernamed witnesses, in the yeare of our Lord God 1505, the eighth Indiction of the most holy See, of our Father and Lord in Christ, by divine providence Pope Iulius the second, in his second yeere, and 27 of the moneth of Iune, in which day the said worthy Prince was of perfect yeares of marriage, as then he did there affirme, in a certaine outward Court within the royall Palace of Richmond, situate in the Westpart of the said Palace: Concerning all and singular which things, the aforesaid most noble Prince instantly required and entreated mee the aforesaid Notarie to frame an instrument, and likewise the witnesses underwritten, to give testimony. In Iustification of all and singular the premisses, the aforesaid Noble Prince hath superscribed his name, and the witnesses, as aforesaid entreated and required, have subscribed their names with their owne hand.

The second protestation when hee came to yeares of marriage.

Notwithstanding this prescription foure yeares after, and the first of his raigne, hee tooke the said Lady Katherine to wife; and without all exception enjoyed her nuptial society the space almost of twenty yeares; in which time thee had borne him two sonnes, both of them in their infancy taken away by death, and one daughter, Lady Mary, growne now unto tenne yeares of age. But the scruple of Conscience increasing more tender in the Kings breast, he first refused the Queenes bed; and then moving the doubt unto his owne Divines, sent for the opinions of the most Vniversities in Europe, as to Paris, Orleance, Bononie, Burges, Anjou, Padua, Tholouze, Vincentia, Pavia, Foro, Iuly, and others, which howsoever they then stood for the Pope, and allowing (by his Predecessors dispensation, whose doing could not erre) the Matrimony lawfull, yet these Academickes concluded against it, and signified the contrary under most of their common Seales, as the relation of the Kings Agent imployed upon the same purpose for that of Padua doth import, which writing under his owne hand I have seene, and here will insert his words, as followeth:

Ex Manuscr.

Pleaseth it your Highnesse to be advertised; that as this day I obtained the Common Seale of the Vniversity of Padua in substantiall and good forme; for all the Doctors were assembled upon Sunday, and the case was amongst them solemnely and earnestly disputed all Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, and this present Friday in the morning. And thereupon they concluded with your Highnesse, and desired a Notary to set his signe and hand unto an instrument by Leonicus and Nicencus devised, in Corroboration of your cause, and thereby to testifie that this instrument was their deed, devise, act, and conclusion. And more credence to be given to the said instrument they caused the Chancellor of the Poteſtate hereto to set his hand and seale for the approbation of the Authority of the Notary: A Copy of all the which things I send unto your Highnesse by this Bearer, in most humble wise beseeching the same to be advertised that the Generall of the Black Friers hath given commandement that no Blacke-Frier dispute the Popes power: Notwithstanding Prior Thom. Omnibonus procureth daily new superscriptions, and will doe till the briefe of contrary commandement shall come unto his hands. My fidelity bindeth me to advertise your Highnesse that all Lutherans be utterly against your Highnesse in this cause, and hath letted as much with their wretched poore malice, without reason or authority, as they could and might, aswell here as in Padua and Ferrara, where be no small company of them: I doubt not but all Christian Vniversities if they be well handled, will earnestly conclude with your Highnesse. And to obtaine their assent as well through Italy, France, Almaine, Austrich, Hungary, and Scotland, I thinke it marvellous expedient for the preferment of this your most honourable and high cause.

The Decree of the Lawyers in the Vniversity of Paris.

We the Deane and Colledge of the Vniversity of Paris, after many disputations and reasons, made upon both sides, turning and searching of Bookes, both by the law of God, the Popes law, and the Civill law; we say, that the Pope hath no power to dispence in this case of Matrimonie. Yeoven under the Seale of their faculty, at Saint Iohn Lateranenſe in Paris, May 2. 1530.

The judgement of the Divines in the Vniversity of Paris.

The Dean and the faculty of holy Divinity in the Vniversity of Paris, to all them to whom this present writing shall came, wisheth safety in Christ; For the question proposed, we come together in the Church of Saint Martin, and there, for the same cause, had a solemne Masse of the Holy Ghost, and upon our oathes determine, that the foresaid Marriage with the brothers wife departing without children is so forbid by the Lawes of God and Nature, that the Pope hath no power to dispence with such Marriages, whether they be contract or to be contracted, to which this our assertion we have caused the Seale of our faculty, with our Notaries signe to be put to this present writing. Dated in our Generall Congregation, Iuly 2. Anno. 1530.

The Determination of the Civilians of the Vniversity of Anjou.

After wee the Doctors and Rector had discussed and examined many places, as well of the Law of God, as of mans Law, upon sufficient deliberation taken, wee define and determine, that neither by the Law of God, nor of Nature, it is permitted for any Christian man, no not with the authority of the See Apostolicke, or with any dispensation granted by the Pope, to marry the wife that his brother hath left. In witnesse whereof we have commanded the Scribe of our Vniversity to signe this present publique instrument with the great Seale of our said Vniversity.

Enacted in the Church of Saint Peter in Anjou. May 7. Anno 1530.

The Determination of the Vniversity of Burges.

Wee the Deane and faculitie of Divinitie, in the Vniversitie of Burges, after the example of Saint Paul the Doctor of the Gentiles, begin with prayer to the quieting of the conscience, to whom this our writing shall come; The Question mooved, is whether the brother taking the wife of his dead brother, the marriage consummated, and perfect, bee a thing lawfull or no. Wee by much labour and turning of Bookes, every one of us apart by himselfe, free from corruption, the better to obey the truth, find it forbidden by the Leviticall Law, which is Gods, and that such marriage is an abhominable discovering of his brothers shame, which cannot be allowed by the authority of any man: which our determination wee have caused to bee signed with the Seale of our faculitie, the tenth day of Iune, and yeare of our Lord 1530.

The opinion of the Divines in the Vniversity of Bonony.

All wee Doctors of Divinitie in this Vniversitie, unto whom this Question was propounded, whether it was forbidden onely by the Ordinance of the Church, or else by the Law of God, that a man might not marry the left wife of his brother departed without children, and having examined the matter every one of us alone, lastly came altogether, and as it were line by line, and rule by rule, brought foorth the reasons for the contrary part, with those of the most Reverend Father Cardinall Cajetane, yea, and of the dispensation for raising up seed to his brother, spoken of in Deuteronomie; thus we determine, give judgement, and say, and confidently doe hold and witnesse that such marriage is horrible, accursed, and to bee cryed out upon, and utterly abhominable, not onely for a Christian man, but for an Infidell, unfaithfull, or Heathen: and that it is prohibited under grievous paines and punishments by the Law of God, of Nature, and of man, and that the Pope, though he may doe much, unto whom Christ gave the Keyes of the Kingdome of Heaven, hath no power to a dispensation to any man to contract such marriage: In witnesse whereof wee confirme this our judgement, both under whereof wee confirme this our judgement, both under the Seale of our Vniversitie, as also with the Seale of our Colledge of Doctors of Divinitie, and have subscribed it in the Cathedall Church of Bonony, this tenth of Iune, the yeare of our Lord 1530.

The Determination of the Vniversity of Padua.

Seeing that certaine great Orators and Ambassadours did humbly require of us, that wee would vouchsafe to search out with all diligence this Question following, Whether to marry the wife of our brother departed without children, is forbidden onely by the Law of the Church, or by the Law of God also: and if forbid by both the Lawes, whether the Pope may dispence with any man for such Matrimony or no? which Question we have discussed, and as farre as wee can, have made it cleare, both private every man by himselfe, and after altogether openly, wee say, judge, decree, witnesse, and for truth affirme, that such marriage is no marriage: yea, and that it is abhorred and cursed of every Christian man, and to bee abhominate as a grievous sinne, and that it is clearely forbidden, under cruell penalty, by the Lawes of nature, of God, and of man, and that the Pope, unto whom the Keyes of the Kingdome of Heaven are committed by Christ the Sonne of God, hath no power to dispence, by the right of Law, for any cause, suggestion, or excuse, that any such Matrimoney should be contracted. In witnesse whereof we have made this writing, and have authorized it, with the accustomed Seale of our Vniversity: dated at Padua in the Church of the Heremites of Saint Augustine, the first of Iuly, and yeare of our Lord 1530.

The Determination of the Vniversity of Tholouze.

It was treated in our Vniversity of Tholouze: whether it were lawfull for a brother to marry her which had beene wife to his brother now departed, and without children: as also, whether the Pope, which hath the cure of Christs flocke, allowing it by his dispensation it be lawfull: to resolve which, the best Doctors of Divinitie, and the Lawes, did sweare that they would obey the sacred Counsels, and would follow the holy Decrees of the Fathers, and falling to conclusion stucke fast upon this point, that it is lawfull for no man, neither by the Law of God, nor by the Law of Nature, to take her to wife that his brother hath left; neither can the Pope dispence with this Law of God: as touching the Commandement in Deuteronomie, that the brother should marry his wife to raise up seede unto him, that his name should not perish among the Tribes of Israel, we answere that that Law was but a shadow and figure of things to come, which vanished away as soone as the substance of the Gospel appeared. Thus have wee given our sentence, which we have signed with our Authenticall Seale of this Vniversitie. Teeven at Tholouze, the Calends, or first day of October, the yeare of our Lord 1530.

These and many more were read by the Lord Chancellour unto the Lower House of Parliament that they might report in their Countries, the Kings just cause of divorce: And with what Key Henrie opened the golden shut of the Popes Consistory for his free accesse, therein to enroll his owne Banes, to his best liking, I cannot say, but thus I finde it confirmed by a Bull of Pope Clement the seaventh, dated three yeares before these published Determinations in these words:

Bulla Clementis Sept. Concessa Henrico Octavo de secundis nupcijs contrahendis constante nulliate primarum.

Clement Bishop, Servant of the Servants of God to our dearely beloved Sonne in Christ, Henry King of England, Defender of the Faith, health, and Apostolicall Benediction.

You caused not long since to bee signified unto us, that you, and our beloved daughter in Christ, Katherine, the late Widdow of your brother Arthur, (not being ignorant how nearely you were otherwise joyned together in the first degree of affinity) have made a contract of Matrimonie by words otherwise lawfull, having at that present obtained no dispensation, at least-wise Canonicall or of any force for the same. That you have confirmed it with carnall knowledge one of another, and have thereby brought forth a Childe, incurring the censure of Excommunication. Moreover, that (in regard your Majestie may not remaine in such kinde of Matrimonie without great offence to GOD, and that you might not continue longer in this sinne and censure of Excommunication) your Majestie doth desire Absolution from such censure of Excommunication at the hands of some sufficient Ecclesiasticall Iudge. Furthermore, that your Majestie doth desire to have this Matrimonie pronounced infirme and of none effect: And that it might bee lawfull for you, (notwithstanding any Canon to the contrary) to make contract with any other woman whatsoever. That upon the pronouncing of the nullity touching this marriage, you might obtaine a dispensation lawfully to bee joyned in Matrimonie, therein freely to remaine and beget a lawfull heire by any other woman whatsoever, yea though such fhee bee who hath otherwise made contract with any other man, so fhee have not confirmed it with carnall knowledge: though fhee bee otherwise nearely allied unto you, either by the second or a more remote remote degree of consanguinity, or the first degree of affinity, or joyned to you by any lawfull or unlawfull lying together: provided fhee bee not the relict of your said Brother, though fhee be annexed to you in kindred spirituall, or legall, yea though it be an hinderance to the right of publique honesty. Wherefore in the behalfe of your part (who affirme that it is to bee seene in ancient Records of your Kingdome, many great grievous warres to have beene raised, Christian peace and concord disquieted through the meanes of wicked men stirred up with their owne detested lust, and desire of dominion, but pretending that those, which have beene begotten in lawfull marriages of your Ancestors and Progenitors Kings of England were illigitimate, by reason of some fayned impediment of consanguinity or affinity, and consequently were not capable of the Kingdomes succession, and that there hath followed miserable destructions of Princes, Nobles, and People,) an humble supplication was made unto us, that wee would have a care of the tranquility and peace of your Kingdome and Subjects, and that wee would (out of our Apostolicall benignity) daigne to resist so great evils, and otherwise in the foresaid danger administer some seasonable remedies. Wee therefore which are ready always (under God) to entertaine, and favourably to grant the honest petitions of all Kings, at least minding the safety of Soules (but more especially your Majesties, for its manifold immeasurable benefits towards us and this holy Seat, wherein by the divine providence of God) wee now sit, not ceasing daily, as well with might and sword, as with penne and learning to free it from the wicked attempts of pestilent men, which adventure partly by force and wicked boldnesse, partly with perverse doctrine utterly to subvert it. Wee, by the forsaid causes, and some others best knowne to our selves, being mooved to such like supplications, by vertue of our Apostolicall authority, out of our certaine knowledge of the matter had by us, and fulnesse of our Apostolicall power, doe by the tenour of these presents, grant you a dispensation, that if it shall so fall out that the contract with the foresaid Katherine shall bee contrarily pronounced voyde, and of none effect, and that you shall be lawfully freed from all interest in her, that then you may lawfully make contract of matrimony with any other woman, and flee with you, provided fhee bee not to this end enforced by you, yea though such fhee be whom hath otherwise contracted her selfe to another man, so fhee hath not confirmed it with carnall knowledge: though that fhee bee otherwise nearely allyed unto you, either by the second or a more remote degree of consanguinity, bee in the first degree of affinity, or joyned to you by any lawfull or unlawfull lying together, provided fhee bee not the relict of your said brother as before, though fhee bee annexed to you in kindred spirituall or legall, yea and bee an hinderance even to the right of publique honesty. And that you may lawfully remaine in this contract, though it were made betwixt you and the said woman, either publiquely or privately, and perfected by carnall knowledge one of the other. Further, wee decree that the issue (perhaps already conceived, or what hereafter may bee conceived) shall bee legitimate, notwithstanding all prohibitions of, divine Lawes and other constitutions or ordinations whatsoever published to the contrary, which wee (as farre as our Apostolicall authority may stretch it selfe) in this case specially and expresly extenuate, they elsewhere standing in full force as before. Distinctly forbidding in the name of holy obedience charging expresely under the pronouncing of Gods holy judgement, the punishment of a Reprobate, and the rest whatsoever ecclesiasticall censures and punishments, which I heere pronounce, and promulgate in these writings, that no man hereafter shall either openly or privately, by Law or otherwise presume, or any way attempt to alleadge, propound, or object any impediment of a pre-contract which was not compleately confirmed, or of consanguinity in the second or farther degree, of affinity in the first degree as before, of kindred spirituall or legall, of hinderance to their honest report as before, against your issue, which by Gods blessing you shall enjoy by any Matrimony whatsoever to bee contracted through the vertue of these presents: or to defame them in words or deeds: Bee it not therefore lawfull for any man to infringe, or by any rash attempt, whatsoever withstand the tenor of our dispensation, decree, derogation, inhibition and charge, which if any one attempt, know hee that hee incurres the wrath of Almighty God, and his blessed Apostles Peter and Paul. Dated in our City Vrbin, Anno Incarnationis Do. 1527. 16. Kal. Ian. Pontificatus nostri 50.

Thus have vve seene the determinations of divers Accademies in Christendome, and likevvise of Pope Clement himselfe, confirmed by his Bull: the first, condemning the retention of that unlavvfull bed: and the other, admitting any other into his bosome, his Brothers relict onely excepted. So that the vvrongs done by King Henry unto Queene Katherine in that divorce, are nothing so capitall, as her favourers alledge them, at least-wise if we hold Pope Clement for an honest man; or his Cardinall Wolsey a fure pillar to be leaned upon, who was a prime actor in the said devorce. To forward which, he went Ambassador into France, laden with Crownes, as Guicciardin. Richard Turpin. G. Caven. and with surpassing pompe, as London beheld, when with twelve hundred Horse hee passed the Bridge for Amiens, there to negociate of this and other businesses with Francis the French King.

But the rumours in England still spreading of the good Queenes divorce, about a yeare after, King Henry to satisfie all, sent for his Nobles, his Councellors, Iudges, and many wise Commoners, unto whom he made a most pithy Oration, shewing them with what "care he had ruled almost twenty yeares with honor "and victory, which (as hee said) would shortly be "clouded, if he should dye and leave them a litigious "Heire, examples he shewed of the wofull experience "of Lancaster and Yorke, in whose dissentions the "Realme was like to have beene utterly destroyed: "and although (saith hee) we have a daughter, to the "great comfort of her mother & me, yet it is told us "by great Clerks, our marriage is not lawfull, but that "she stands in case of illegitimation; and we both, are "said to live in abominable Adultery: thinke you (my "Lords) that these words doe not touch my very "Soule, the perill whereof we venture, as you do also "your Inheritance? for wch cause I have asked counsell of the greatest Clerks in Christendom, & have "likewise heard the opinion of mine owne. But as "touching the Queene, if it be judged by the Law of "God that she is my lawfull Wife, there shall be no "thing more acceptable unto me, whose noble conditions, I assure you, (besides her great Parentage) is "most gentle, loving, and obedient, whereof I have "had a true experience almost these twenty yeares: "and were I to choose a wife (if the marriage might "stand with Gods Law) my choice should be of her, "before any other woman in the world, and if it shall "otherwise be proved, I shall not onely be most forrowfull for parting with so loving a companion, "but much more have occasion to lament my chance "and life in so foule a sinne; these then are the sores "that torments my mind, for the saving of my soule, "and for which cause I have here assembled you, that "you may declare to our loving subjects this our true "meaning, and to stay (if it may be) the rumours of "unstayed reports. And this being said, he let them to depart, each man bewraying in countenance the affection of his mind, some pittying the King to see him so perplexed, some, favouring the Queene, forrowed her case, and some sighed deeply at this strange speech and sudden alteration.

Then was the Queene called by the name of Queene Katherine to come into the Court, who made no anſwer at all, but preſently roſe up, and going about the Court to the King, fell downe on her knees, before his feete, and in the hearing of the people, ſpake thus in effect.

And therewithall riſing, and making lowly obeyſance to the King, departed thence, leaning upon the Arme of her receiver, each man expecting ſhee had returned to her ſeat, when as ſhee tooke directly out of the place; which being perceived, the Cryer againe called her by the name of Queene Katherine to come into the Court; Madam, quoth her guide, you are againe called; On, on, ſaid ſhee, it maketh no matter, this is no indifferent Court for me, therefore goe forward.

Queene Katherine departed the Court.

(70) The King perceiving that ſhe was departed, preſently ſpake thus unto the aſſembly. True it is, ſaid the Lord of Canterbury, and I doubt not but that all my brethren here preſent will acknowledge the ſame. Not ſo my Lord, ſaid the Biſhop of Rocheſter, you never had my hand to that Inſtrument, nor never ſhall. Indeed, ſaid Canterbury, you did it not your ſelfe, but admitted me to ſub-ſcribe your name, and allowed me your Seale; under your correction, ſaid Rocheſter, that is not ſo; Well, well, (quoth the King) you are but one man, againſt whom at this time we will not diſpute, and ſo roſe up, and the Court adjourned untill another day. Which was upon the next following, twentieth of May, the two Cardinals being ſet, the Lawyers were ready upon either parts. ſhe was carnally knowne, was urged the report of his Chamberlaine, upon certaine words ſpoken by Prince Arthur the firſt Morning that he roſe from her bed.

Greateſt preſumptions that Qu. Katherine had beene carnally knowne by Prince Arthur.

(71) The Negatives denied all the preſumptions, eſpecially this laſt, as to farre unbeſeeming that reverend aſſembly and honourable Court. But by theſe Authenticall records which M. Fox had in his cuſtody, the matter is paſt all contradiction for her carnall knowledge, where it is affirmed that the Ambaſſadors of Ferdinando, being in England to ſee the ſame marriage conſummated, returned their knowledge of their mutuall conjunction, as that nothing was left unperformed of any nuptiall right; and they being of yeares able to explete the act, he above fifteene, and ſhe above ſeventeene; laid both in one bed almoſt five moneths together, doe aſſure us the certaintie of that, which they made their greateſt doubt, unleſſe the Popes diſpenſation was a Core to the cauſe. But that ſhe was carnally knowne, the Vniverſitie of Padua had concluded in their ſentence, whom the Emperours Ambaſſadours earneſtly ſollicited, either to retract their ſaid Grant, or to give forth a new Sentence upon the caſe that the Queene was not carnaliter cognita ab illuſtriſſimo Principe Arthuro, or to determine that this Matrimony was not dirimendum, which in no wiſe they could obtaine, though they offered very largely to have it done. Thus from day to day the pleas proceeded, but nothing concluded touching the divorce; whereupon the King ſent the two Cardinals to perſwade with the Queene to put the whole matter onely to himſelfe; which would be farre better, and more honourable for her, then to ſtand to the tryall of Law.

(72) Theſe Legates accordingly repaired to Bridewell, and in the preſence ſtaied for the Queene, who preſently from among her maids at work came forth unto them, having a skeine of white thread about her necke; at whoſe ſight ſhe ſaid, Alacke my Lords, I am very ſorry to make you attend upon me; What is your will? If it pleaſe your Grace, (quoth Cardinall Wolſey) to goe into your privy-Chamber, we will deliver the cauſe of our comming: My Lord (quoth ſhe) this place is moſt fit, I pray you therefore declare here your minds. With that he began his ſpeech in Latine, which ſhe preſently interrupted, ſaying, that ſhe underſtood the Engliſh very well.

(73) Madam (quoth the Cardinall) we are come "in good will, to know your Graces minde, in this "great matter of your marriage, and to give you our "adviſe with the beſt ſervice we can. My Lords (ſaid "ſhe) I thanke you, but for anſwere of my reſolution, "I cannot ſo ſuddenly make, the cauſe is great, and "toucheth me very neere; I am here a ſtranger, a poore "woman, lacking wit, not able to anſwer ſuch noble "and wiſe Perſonages as ye be, I have need of coun-"ſell, and they be in Spaine; for thinke you, my "Lords, that any Engliſh ſubjects, will be for mee a-"gainſt the King? forſooth I know they will not, I "pray your Lordſhips be good unto mee, a forrainer "and deſtiture of friends, and aſſiſt mee with your "Counſels, which I will be glad to heare. And there-upon taking them by the hands, led them into her Chamber, where they ſtayed ſomewhat long; which done, they departed, and made relation of her anſwer unto the King. Who nothing pleaſed at the anſwer ſhe made them, ſent againe certaine Lords unto her, to ſhew her the determinations of thoſe Chriſtian Vniverſities, who had preſcribed the marriage unlawfull, and to wiſh her to remit the matter for the quieting of the Kings conſcience unto foure Prelates, and foure temporall Lords: Vnto whom ſhee anſwered, ſaying, "The King my Father which concluded my "marriage, I am ſure was not ſo ignorant, but he asked "counſell of Clerkes and well-learned men, before he "married me the ſecond time: for if he had had any "doubt in my marriage, he would not have disbur-"ſed ſo great a treaſure as he did, and then all the "Doctors agreed my marriage to be good; inſomuch "that the Pope himſelfe, which knew beſt what was "to be done, did both diſpence and ratifie the ſecond "marriage, againſt whoſe doings I marvaile that any "perſon will ſpeake or write. But as touching the "determinations of the Vniverſities, I am a woman, "and lacke wit and learning to anſwer to them, but "to God I commit the judgement of that, whether "they have done juſtly or partially: for this I am "ſure, that neither the Kings Father, nor my Father "would have condiſcended to our marriage, if it had "beene declared to be unlawfull; and where you "ſay, I ſhould put the cauſe to eight perſons of this "Realme for quieteneſſe of the Kings conſcience; I "pray God ſend his Grace a quiet conſcience: and "this ſhall be your anſwer, that I ſay I am his law-"full wife, and to him lawfully married, and by the "order of the holy Church, I was to him eſpouſed "as his true Wife, (although I was ſo unworthy) and "in that point I will abide, till the Court of Rome, "which was privy to the beginning, have made "thereof a determination and finall end.

The Queenes anſwer.

(74) The King then hopeleſſe of his Queenes conſent, haſted his Lawyers to forward their divorce, which daily they did, and the Conſiſtory at Blacke-Friers daily frequented, all points in Law were opened to the full, ſo that nothing now remained but the ſentence of the Iudges: for which a ſolemne day was aſſigned, when the King in perſon came to heare it himſelfe. His ſeat taken, and the Court ſet, after a cry for ſilence, the proceedings were openly read, and all doubts cleared, the learned Counſell at Bar called for Iudgement, whereunto Campius, the Popes ſtout Champion, upon his ſtiffe gouty legges flood up, all men expecting the ſentence of Divorce, but the Cardinall now not to learne what he had formerly determined, ſaid flatly, "I will not give judgement in this "matter, too high for us, conſidering the eſtates of "the Perſons, and the doubtfulneſſe of the occaſions "alledged, untill I have made a full relation to the "Popes Holineſſe of all our proceedings, whoſe "counſell and commandement in this caſe I will ob-"ſerve and follow, under whoſe authoritie we ſit and "are Commiſſioners, therefore I will adjourne the "Court for this time, according to the order of the "Court of Rome, from whence our ſemblable juriſ-"diction is derived. Which, how it diſpleaſed the King, the Sequell will ſhew, and how then taken, the words of the Duke of Suffolke did well declare, who ſtepping forth, with a ſterne countenance uſed "theſe words; It was never merry in England ſince "we have had any Cardinals among us.

King Henry proſecuteth his divorce.

Cardinall Campius referreth the cauſe of Divorce to the judgement of the Pope.

The ſaying of the Duke of Suffolke.

The Iudgement thus ſtaid, the King ſent his Secretary Stephen Gardiner to Rome, to follow that Court, whither Queene Katherine had made her appeale: and Cardinall Campius admitted to depart, went away in no ſuch eſtate as was held fit for a Man of his place, but rather as one ſuſpected to carry with him more then his owne, had all his Chests ſearched at Calis, even to the Cloke-bags and Males. The cauſe of this ſtay (ſaith Sleidan) was, that the French King, an entire friend unto Rome, had no better ſucceſſe in Naples, againſt the Emperour, whom the Pope durſt not diſpleaſe, the Lady Katherine being his Aunt, for whom the Emperour was ſo earneſt, as in her behalfe hee laboured Millan and many other places, that their learned men ſhould not determine againſt the ſaid Queene. But whatſoever the cauſe was, that Campius denied his ſentence for the Divorce, certaine it is, that Cardinall Wolſey fell likewiſe in great diſpleaſure of the King, though he ſought to excuſe himſelfe with vvant of ſufficient authoritie: but novv his Sun having paſſed the Meridian of his greatneſſe, began by degrees againe to decline, till laſtly it fet under the cloud of his fatall eclipſe.

At his Masse he was served by Dukes, and Earles, who took the assay of his wine on their knees, and held him his Basen at the Lavatory. And being Ambassadour unto the Emperour at Brussels, was there waited upon by many Noble-men of England, and served at Table by his servitors upon their knees, to the great admiration of the Germaines which beheld it: and indeed so much over-topped the Pompe of a spirituall function, as hee seemed to the more humble, to be mad for joy; and him doth Campian judge, rather to be a Bastard of some Prince, then the sonne of a Butchers so moulded for the one, and so far mounting from the other: exceedingly wife he was, and very well spoken, but full of revenge, and vicious of body, thrall to affection, and lulled asleepe with flattery, insatiable to get, but princely in bestowing, loftie to his enemies, and not easily reconciled, which hastened his fall, when he first began to slip. Queene Katherine in her cause, did grievously accuse him; the Councell for their parts did article against him; the Law found him in a premunire unto the King; and Sir Thomas Moore in the high Court of Parliament, inveighed bitterly against him.

Complaints against Wolsey.

(76) The first step of his discent was his dislike of the Kings affection unto Anne Bullen, a Gentlewoman nothing favourable to his Pontificall pompe, nor no great follower of the Rite of those times, which moved the Cardinall (the Pope having assumed the sentence of Queene Katherines cause unto himselfe) to write unto his Holinesse to deferre the judement of Divorce, till he had wrought the Kings minde in another mould. This was not done so secretly, but that it came to the Kings eare, and lastly cost the proud Cardinal his life. For the broad seale first taken from him, and his other Bishopricks elsewhere bestowed, his House and furniture seized upon, and himselfe removed into the North, at Cawood-castle seven miles from Yorke, was suddenly arrested (for arrogant words importing a desire of revengement, saith Sleidan) by the Earle of Northumberland, whence he was conveied toward London by the Lieutenant of the Tower, in wch journey at Leicester Abbey he ended his life, whose death himselfe had hastened by taking an over-much quantity of a confection to breake winde from off his stomacke, and in that Church was there enterred.

(77) The grudges against this Cardinall were many and great, not onely for the especiall favour he stood in with the King, and great stroake he bare at Counsell-Boord, (both which commonly breed emulation unto the man so estated) but for his intollerable pillings, who to patch up his pride in the raising of his new Colledges, erected at Oxford and Ipswich, by the License of Pope Clement 7. suppressed fortie Monasteries of good fame, and bountifull Hospitalitie, converting all their goods and moveables into his owne Coffers; which were so stuffed with treasure, that twelve Barrels full of Gold and Silver were laid aside, to serve the Pope in his warres. As also, that he emptied the Land of twelve-score thousand pound, enforced by him from the King. All which he converted to relieve, and ransome the Pope then in Prison, to the great impoverishing of his Majesties Cofers. That his owne revenewes by his faculties, licenses, and other legantine exactions did equalize the Kings yearely Revenewes, and lastly his pride so intollerable, as no lesse then twvelve hundred Horse for his retinue, fourescore Wagons for his carriage, and threescore Mules for sumpter-Horses attended him into France. But sic transit gloria mundi, for the highest sloud is subject to an ebbe.

(78) But whilest the matter of the Kings marriage hung thus in suspence the space of twvo yeares, and other Ambassadors intended to be sent unto Rome: it chanced Doctor Cranmer, Doctor Stephens, and Doctor Fox to meet at Waltham at one Table, vvhere the tvvo latter, great Agents for the King, fell in discourse of his cause, by rearmes and strength of the Civill-Lavv. Well, said Doctor Cranmer, if I might be heard, I thinke much better it might be tried by Gods Law: whereby the King should be furer setled in the cause of his Conscience, then thus to be posted off with delayes from yeare to yeare. This speech Doctor Fox made knowne to his Majesty, which founded very tunably in his eare, then was Cranmar sent for, conferred with by the King, and commanded to write his minde in the matter, but with this caution prefixed, not to respect the persons but the cause; who to him commended the vertuous perfections of his Queene, with whom above all others he most desired to continue, if their marriage could be made warrantable by Gods Lawes: to which end he commended the care of Bookes, and of his other Provisions unto the Earle of Wiltshire at Durham Place. The Doctor thus set on worke, when he least looked to be so imployed, proved by Scriptures, Generall Councels, Ancient Writers, besides the presents, and his owne opinion, That the Bishop of Rome had no authoritie to dispence with the word of God, nor the Scriptures.

Doctor Cranmer first sets to the King.

(79) The treatise thus finished, he presented it to the King, which when he had well read, and weighed the substance therein contained; Will you (quoth he) Master Doctor, abide by what you have writ? That will I by Gods grace said Cranmar, even before the Pope himself, if your Majesty wil so assigne it; Marry, quoth the King to him shall you go. Whereupon Thomas Bullen Earle of Wiltshire, Doctor Stokesley, Elect of London, Doctor Lee the Kings Almoner, the Doctors Crane, Bennet, and Cranmar, were sent to the Pope then at Bononie in Italy. The day approached for audience of their Ambassage, and the high Prelate set upon his Throne of Estate, the Doctor prepared to make his Oration in defence of what he had writ, when on the sudden he was interrupted by an unmannerly spaniell of the Earles, who seeing the Pope put forth his foot to be kist, caught in his teeth the Pontificals great Toe, so that these Ambassadors disdaining to kisse where the dogge had taken an assay, let the Pope draw backe his foot, and so lost that especiall favour offered unto them. The Proposition then made, that no man, jure divino, could or ought to marry his Brothers Wife, and that the Bishop of Rome by no meanes could dispence to the contrary, was replied unto, that it should be answered at more leasure, when his Holinesse returned to Rome; in the meane while, to grace Cranmar the more, he gratified him with the office of the Penitenciarishipp, and so dismissed the Ambassadors: who all, saving Cranmar, returned to England; but he tooke his way towards the Emperour, (to whom the cause somewhat appertained) being then at Vienna in his expedition against the Turke, unto whose learned men he offered disputation, and in private conference so satisfied Cornelius Agrippa, the most respected for learning in the Emperours Court; as he held the Proposition most true. Whereupon, others learned, were discouraged to dispute, and suffered Cranmar to depart without any further proceedings.

(80) The matter thus manifested in most parts of Christendome, this Gordians knot was lastly unloosed by King Henry himselfe, who now besides this his marriage began to call in question, what authority the Pope had in his dominions, which being afterwards debated in Parliament, an Act passed against his usurped Hierarchy, & all persons forbidden to appeale, or to make any payments unto Rome. The Kings marriage with Lady Katherine, was by the same Parliament dissolved, and his separation from her, made by the Archbishop of Canterbury to stand good, and effectuall by Law, and that Queene Katherine from thenceforth should be called Princesse Dowager, which doings she tooke so to heart, as she procured the Popes curse against King Henry and his Realme, which curse was set up at Dunkirke in Flanders, for that the bringer thereof durst come no neerer. And the Pope in revenge of himselfe, being set in his Consistory accompanied with his Cardinals, proceeded to the Censure of these great Princes marriage, which he then adjudged to stand most firme and Canonicall, and and enjoyned K. Henry to hold matrimoniall societie with the said Katherine his lawfull wife and Queene, and in that estate to account and maintaine her as it became a King and loving Husband to doe, and if he refused to accomplish these premisses, then to bee compelled thereunto, and never after to be heard in any Court, as touching the invalidity of the said marriage, and to pay the expences of the said traverse, as he the holy Father should limit and thinke meet. This was done a yeare after that the King had married Queene Anne, and bare date from Rome, the 23. of March and yeare of Christ 1534. When afterwards King Henry set his affection upon the Lady Anne Bullen, a Phenix indeed in his Princely eye, and another Hester for Englands salvation, both in her selfe and royall Bud succeeding, as the Heavens and World doe witnesse to this day. Shee was the daughter of Sir Thomas Bullen Viscount Rochford, Earle of Wiltshire, and of Lady Elizabeth, daughter of Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolke. This Earle Thomas her father was the sonne of Sir William Bullen, whose wife was Lady Margaret, the second daughter and Coheire of Thomas Butler Earle of Ormond, and the said Sir William was the sonne of Sir Godfrey Bullen Lord Mayor of London, who lyeth buried in Saint Laurence Church in the Iewry, pictured in his winding sheet upon a plate of Brasse, and about his Grave-stone upon a border of Brasse in many places these words are written, Now thus, Now thus, Now thus, whose Charitie was extended upon the poore Housholders of that city, to distributing among them a thousand pounds. His Lady was Anne, eldest daughter and Coheire unto Thomas Lord Hoo and Hasting, and his discent out of the Houſe of the Bullens, an ancient Family in the County of Norfolke; accursed therefore be the pen, that slanderously bringeth this Rose from a defiled Bed, whose Serpents mouth to uphold his God the Pope, hath spewed out his poyson of untruths, and made his tongue a sharpe sword against the Lords anointed; let him therefore receive his portion with the Serpent of deceit, and his reward with Sathan the father of Lies.

(81) This Ladies religion was different from all Papall indulgences, imbracing the Gospel that then began in our vulgar language to be read, for which cause faith Sleiden, she was accounted a Lutheran, cause enough to be envied at, by the Bishops of that time.

(82) Her, the King invested Marchioneſſe of Pembroke with Mantle and Coronet, both in regard of her Nobility, and many vertues (for so run the words of her Patent) which done, he tooke the Seas for France, accompanied with such a traine of his Nobles, as the like had not beene seene, and among many Ladies Anne Bullen was one, where he complained to the French King of the great wrongs offered him by the dull Pope, as he called him, who would have Kings in person to attend his leasure at Rome, and contrary to their Kingly dignities, to expose themselves and affaires at his will there, to bondage and great danger; and therefore he earnestly requested that the Pope might be summoned to a Councell, to answer the many abuses that he had offered unto most of the Princes in Christendome, and unto himselfe not the least; who for his part had allowed him threescore thousand Angels monthly, to maintaine an Army for his deliverance out of the Castle of Angell; where the Emperials under the Prince of Orenge kept him. Which his businesse being ended in France, and the King againe returned into England, hee presently (though privily) married the said Lady Marchioneſſe in his Closet at Whitehall, in the presence of many; the Lady Anne Savage bearing her Traine, and Doctor Lee doing the rites of their conjunction, who was afterwards confecrated Bishop of Chester, Coventree, and Lichfield, and President of Wales.

(83) The Romanists much fearing that Babell would downe, if Queene Anne might be heard against wicked * Haman, fought to under-prop the foundations thereof, with certaine devises of their owne; and that the same might passe without note of suspition, they laid their forgery even upon Heaven it selfe; whose pretended Oracle Elizabeth Barton (commonly called, the holy made of Kent) was made to be; and the pillers of this godlesse Fabricke were Edward Backing, a Monke by profession, and Doctor of Divinity, Richard Masters, Parson of Aldington, the Towne wherein she dwelt, Richard Deering a Monke, Hugh Rich a Fryer, John Adestone, and Thomas Abell, Priests, put to their helping hands, and Henry Gould Bachelour of Divinity, with John Fisher the Reverend Father of Rochester, imployed their paines to daube these downe-falling walles, with their untempered Morter. The Scribes that set their pens for her Miracles, were Edward Thwaites Gentleman, and Thomas Lawrence Regester, besides Hawkherst a Monke who writa Letter that was forged to be sent her from Heaven; and Richard Risby and Thomas Gould, were the men which dispersed her Miracles abroad to the world. This holy maide Elizabeth made a Votarisse in Canterbury, was taught by Backing her ghostly Father, and suspected Paramour, to counterfeit many fained trances, and in the same to utter many vertuous words for the rebuke of sin, under which, more freely she was heard against Luthers Doctrine, and the Scriptures translation, then desired of many: neither so only, but that she gave forth from God, and his Saints, by sundry suggestive Revelations, that if the King proceeded in his divorce, and second marriage, hee should not raigne in his Realme one moneth after, nor rest in Gods favour the space of an houre. But the truth discovered by Gods true Ministers, this Oracle gave place as all other such did, when Christ by his death stopped their lying mouthes: for her selfe and * seven of her Disciples were executed for Treason at Tiborne, and the other sixe put to their fines and imprisonment. With the like counterfeit revelations and fained predictions this Generation of Hypocrites had brought Edward Lord Stafford, Duke of Buckingham unto his unhappy end, when as by the working of Iohn de la Court, his owne Confessor, together with Nicholas Hopkins, a Monke of the Carthusian Order, in the Priory of Henton in Somersetshire, who by his visions from heaven forsooth, hearkned him for the Crowne; but before his owne Coronet could aspire to that top, hee worthily lost both head and all upon Tower-hill for his treason, Anno Dom. 1521. Vnto such sinnes the world was then subject, and into such conceits their repured holinesse had brought them, not onely among the simple and unlettered, but even with them that seemed to bee learned indeed; for by certaine predictions fore-shewing a great deluge, Prior Bolton of Saint Bartholomewes in London, was so fearefull, that he built him a house upon the height of Harrow-hill, storing it with provisions necessary, to keepe himselfe from drowning, in Anno Dom. 1524.

(84) But the Popes Holinesse fearing the event of the game, if every man might set & cast at his crowne, thought it high time to lay hand on his own stake, and to keepe what was left, lest all would bee gone; to which end hee sollicited many Christian Princes to stand on his part, and among them sent his Breefe unto Iames the fift King of Scotland, desiring his assistance against King Henry of England, whom in his Consistory hee had pronounced to bean Hereticke, a Schismaticke, a manifest Adulterer, a publike murtherer, a committer of Sacriledge, a Rebell, and convict of Lasæ Majestatis, for that he had risen against him who was his Lord. And therefore he had justly deprived him of his said Kingdome, and would dispose the same to him and other Princes, so as they would assist to recover the same: a very good provision, and very well fore-seene; for notwithstanding their boisterous blasts from Rome, the King kept his Crown and was rather feared of the Popes best Abetters, then did feare any potent power that the world could afford, whose thoughts were now busied for the Coronation of his Queene.

(86) True it is, that the zealous conversation of this godly Queene gaue great encouragements unto many, more publikely with boldnesse to professe the Gospell; so that the Ministers formerly fled in case of Religion, returned againe into England, where the new Testament (translated by Tyndall) was read, but with such dislikes to the Bishops, that they got it to bee burnt. Notwithstanding, to tickle the Kings eare, they preached against the Popes supremacy, and took the Oath for the King themselves; abolished his authority by Act of Parliament, and suppressed many Monasteries; leaving their revenewes to the Kings will; faire introductions indeed for what they intended, as the sequell of the sixe Articles by them procured, doth manifestly shew: and those purposely made against the maintainers of the Gospel, wherof Queene Anne was the chiefe; who first was most favourable to those learned Divines, that laid mans falvation upon the Rocke Christ; next in procuring a tolleration from the King for them, whose doctrine did daily undermine the Papall foundation: and lastly, she by no meanes would consent to marry the King, untill a lawfull divorce was had for his separation from Lady Katherine, his brother Arthurs wife, which thing this pope greatly withstood: these were causes sufficient to move his Holinesse to bend his brow, & by his Instruments in Court to cut off this principall moover, who foreflowing no time, took the Bal before his rebound.

(87) For the Queene delivered of a dead child, and the Kings affection wandring elsewhere, gave them occasion to worke on that Subject, which God in his wisdome would have done; lest his deliverance from the bondage of darkenesse should be attributed to any fleshly arme; or that she who then sate in the throne of the worlds full felicity, should fixe her senses on so fickle a Center, who having had experience what it was to be a Prince, must henceforth practise the patience of a poore prisoner; which in the third yeare of her marriage, and fecond of May, to act the wofull Scene of her Tragedy, she came upon the Stage; being sent to the Tower of London, and charged with high Treason against the King: at whose first entrance thee fell on her knees before Thomas Audley Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Norfolke, and Thomas Cromwell Secretary, her bringers, desiring God so to helpe her as she was guiltlesse of those things whereof shee was accused, beseeching those Lords to be Petitioners unto his Majesty in her behalfe, who lamenting her case, left her Prisoner with Sir William Kingston Constable of the place.

None of them all that were accused in the same Treason, confessing the act even unto death, but have left direct Testimonies in writing to the contrary; one meane Groome excepted, namely* Marke Smeton; made confession upon some promise of life belike, but had his head cut off before he was aware, or had time to recall what he had said. The like did Cromwell the Secretary signifie to the King, after the prisoners had beene throughly examined in the Tower by the Councell, who wrote thus in his letter on the same day; Many things have beene objected, but nothing confessed, onely some circumstances have beene acknowledged by Marke. And so doth Cranmer Archbishop of Canterbury in his Letter of comfort unto the King, who fore lamented that such a star was falne, if her guilt could be proved, & willed his Highnesse to stand in defence of the Gospell, as shee had done, without any report of confessing or acknowledging any such Acts as were objected, which as Sleiden writeth, were Adultery, and incest, but unjustly (saith he) as it is supposed and prooved since: With her were executed certaine Gentlemen of the Kings Privy Chamber, namely, Norris, Weston, Brewton, and one Markes, which contrary to his conscience (as it is reported) for hope of preferment subscribed to a Bill, whereby hee condemned both himselfe, and all the rest.

The extemple of Queene Annes penancy.

"(90) Good Christian people, I am come hither to "dye, for according to the Law, and by the Law, I am "judged to death, and therefore I will speake nothing "against it; I come hither to accuse no man, nor to "speake any thing of that whereof I am accused and "condemned; as for mine owne offences God know- "eth them, & unto God I remit them, beseeching him "to have mercy upon my foule, and if any person will "meddle in my cause, I desire them to judge the best; "and so I take my leave of the world, and of you all, "and heartily doe beseech you to pray for me; and I "beseech Iesus save my Soveraigne and Master the "King, the most godliest, noblest, and gentlest Prince, "that is, long to raigne over you. These words she "uttered with a smilling countenance, which done, she "kneeled downe, and with a fervent Spirit said, to "Iesus Christ I commend my foule, Lord Iesus re- "ceive my soule: and repeating those words very often, suddainly the stroke of the sword sealed the debt that she owed unto death; whose head and body was buried in the quier of the Chappell in the Tower.

(91) Now that her death was rather sought for, then any wise deserved, doth witnesse the sword, whose edge was not wiped from the bloud of her death, before the marriage-bed of the King was prepared for another wife, which was Lady Iane Seimer, in vertues her equall; who upon the next day following being the 20. of May, was married unto the King, and succeeded this unfortunate Lady in place of his Queene.

(92) And albeit Queene Anne in her life time had sinned, as David; or by frailty fell, as who sinneth not: yet that it should bee so licentious and unnaturall, the quiet of her conscience at her death, did well witnesse the contrary, and her innocency so much more apparant, as her Christian modesty, in excusing her Soveraigne, and yeelding obedience to the law, howsoever Poole and Paulus Iovius, from their Cardinals spleenes, have filled their pennes to blot her faire name, whose death notwithstanding was so grievously taken among the German Protestant Princes, who were minded to have made King Henry the head of their league, that thereupon they utterly brake off, and refused him, onely for the cause and death of this most Christian Queene, whose Religion and vertues daily shewed forth the fruits of her life, both in preferring the best men of gifts unto the best Benefices, and also retaining for her Chapleins them of good fame, whose godly exhortations shee did not onely follow, but would will them freely to tell her what they saw in her amisse. So mercifull she was to the poore, that shee spent almost her whole revenew for for their reliefe, and in nine moneths space distributed among them to the value of fifteen thousand pounds, intending likewise to bestow a great stocke into the foure quarters of the Realme, to set poore Artificers on worke. Now if the tree be knowne by the fruits, as truely it is, then these were her lights that shined before men, and the workes that shewed the fruits of her faith, farre from such sinnes, as the sway of those times charged her with.

(93) And by the working of the same faith, her penancy was seene, in her sorrowes conceived, and thirsting reconciliation unto them whom she had any wise offended, as by this worthy example is apparant; when the day before she suffered death, being attended upon with sixe Ladies in the Tower, she took the Lady Kingston into her Presence Chamber, and there locking the dore upon them, willed her to sit down in the Chaire of Estate: whereunto she answered, that it was her duty to stand, and not to sit at all in her presence, much lesse upon the seat and state of her, her Queene. Ah Madam, quoth she, that title is gone, I am a condemned person, and by law have no estate left me in this life; but for clearing of my conscience, I pray you sit downe; well, said the Lady Kingstone, I have often plaide the foole in my youth, and to fulfill your command, I will doe it once more in mine age, and thereupon sate downe under the cloath of Estate; which no sooner was done, but that the Queene most humbly fell upon her knees before her, & with teares, holding up her hands, charged her in the presence of God and his Angels, as she would answer her before them, when all should appeare in judgement, that she should so fall downe before the Lady Maries Grace, her daughter in Law; and in her name in like manner, aske her forgivenes for the wrongs she had done her, for till that was accomplished (she said) her conscience could not be quiet: what her offence was to herward, we know not, but may be supposed not to be capitall, the Queenes case wayed, the time considered, and her enemies none of the meanest, onely this I observe, that as she cleared her conscience of the lesser crimes, so undoubtedly would shee have done of the greater, if any had beene committed, and so as her self instantly desired, I commit her case to be charitably spoken of, and leave her and them unto the Lord.

(94) But as one pillar for the Gospels defence was falne by the death of Queene Anne, so another was raised, by raising Cromwell from the base of his birth, no better indeed then a Blacke-smiths sonne, who serving great Wolsey in the office of his Solicitor, was employed by him for the suppreffion of forty Monasteries, to the erection of his Colledges at * Oxford & Ipswich; by which he mounted those steps of estate, which (but not kept) him in the high chaire of his authority; first by K. Henry he was made Master of his Iewelhouse, then Baron of Okeham in Rutlandshire, then Knight of the Garter, ere long was created Earle of Essex, then was he made Lord great Chamberlaine, & lastly ordained the Kings Vicar Generall; and thus farre fortune brought him from the Forge for a fall.

(95) For K. Henry unstayed in religious resolution (the Supremacy settled where he would have it, & the revenews of all Monasteries given him by Parliament) sought no further to reforme the Churches abuses, but onely gave way that the Lords Prayer, the Creed, and Commandements might be read in English, which Cromwell procured to be enacted by Parliament. The Commons then misliking that their mumblings must downe, & the Monks soretroubled to mingle English in their Masses, the Lincolneshire men began a Commotion, under the conduct of D. Mackarell a Monke, who named himself Captaine Cobler, & his followers were growne well neere unto twenty thousand. Against these, the King in person prepared, sending forth his command unto severall Counties, to charge them with a taxation of furnished Souldiers to meet him at Amphell, as by * one we have seene signed with the stampe of his hand, and sent unto the Bishop of Exceter for foure hundred able men, whereof sixscore to be Archers, which great preparation being knowne to the Rebels, they sent to his Majesty these Articles, subscribed with many of their hands, the tenour whereof out of the Originall it self was, as followeth.

To the King our Soveraigne Lord.

The aggreevances of the Commons of Lincolnshire.

Pleaseth it your Highnesse to be advertised, that your poore Comminaltie, true and faithfull Subjects, in your County of Lincolne, at this present time assembled, findeth our selves grieved in these Articles hereafter following.

Suppression of Monasteries.

First, for the suppressiō of so many religious houses, as be at this instant time suppressed. Whereby the service of God is not onely minished, but also the poorealty of your Realme beunrelieved, and many persons be put from their livings, and left at large, which we thinke is a great hindrance to the Common-wealth.

Act of Vse.

The second Article is, that we humbly beseech your Grace, that the Act of uses may be repealed, because we thinke that by the said Act we be clearely restrained of our liberties, in the declaration of our Willes, concerning our landsas well for the paiment of our debts, for doing of your Grace service, as for helping and relieving of our children, which we have had by the sufferance of your lawes by a long continuance, which we thinke is great hurt and discommoditie to the Common-wealth.

Taxe of quindecim.

The third Article is, that where your Grace hath a taxe, or quindecim, granted unto you by Act of Parliament, payable the next yeare: which is, and ever hath beene leveable of schepe and catall: And the schepe and catall of your Subjects within this said Shire, are now at this instant utterly decayed & gone. Whereby yff your Grace will take the said taxe, Your said Subjects should be constrained to pay iiij. d. for a beast, and xij. d. for xx. schepe: And that would be an importunate charge to theym, considered the poverty that they be in already, and the losse which they have sustained these two yeares by-past.

Counsellors disliked.

The fowrt Article is, that we your true and faithfull Subjects, thynkes that your Grace takes of your Councell, and very nygh about you, such Persones as be of lawe birth, and finale reputation, which have procured the premysses, most especiall for their singler lucre and advantage: the which we suspect to be the Lord Cromwell, and Sir Richard Rich Chanceller of the augmentations.

Tenths of spirituall liviings.

The fift Article is, your Grace to have the xth. and firft fruites of every spirituall promotion, of the value of xx.l. and above. And of all other under the said value which doe not keepe residence and hospitalitie of their said Benefices.

Dislike of Bishops.

The sixt Article is, that we your true Subjects finde them grieved, that there be divers Bishops of Ingland, of your Grace late promotion, that have subverted the faith of Crist, as wee thinke, which is the Archbyshop of Canterbury, the Bishoppe of Rochester, the Byshop of Salisbury, the Byshop of Saint Davyes, and the Byshop of Develyn. And in especiall as wee thinke the beginning of all the troble of this Realme, and the gret exactions that hath beene taken of your poore Communaltie, have risen by the occasion of the Bishop of Lincolne: by whose Officers, and by other of the Lord Cromwels servants, a great rumor and noyse is risen, and the commune voce is, that such Iowellys, Plate, and other anornaments of our Parish Churches, which wee occupy in the service and honour of God, should be taken from us, and spoiled in like maner and facion, as the housys of Religion hath bene. For a reformation of all and syngler the forefaid abuses. We your poore and trewe Subjects humble requirys your Grace and Majestie, that it might please your Highnesse to call unto you the Nobility of this your Realme, to see such Order and direction concerning all and singler the premisses, as may stand with honour and seveerity of your Grace, the vvelthe and prosperitie of your Realme, and the contentation of us your poore Subjects, and other the vvhole Communaltie of this your Realme.

Thom. Cranmer. Iohn Lyster.

Iohn Longland.

Whereby

Whereby we shall not onely accept your Grace to be the Head and Soveraigne of us your Subjects, but also accept and take your Grace to be Supreme head of the Church of Ingland, which we doe knowledge your Grace trewe inheritance and right.

Also your said trewe and faithfull subjects, with the hole assent of all your Communaltie of the said Shire, most humbly beseechith your gracious Majesty, to perdon this poore bearer in doing this his message to your Highnesse, who is your trewe and faithfull subject, and hath taken this message upon him for the fervent love that he hath to your Grace most for the fervent love that he hath to your Grace most in especiall, and for the staying of your Cominaltie ever sens this ruffull began, hath bene as glad with all his diligence to stay the commune people for the effusion of bloud, as be all his powre he might. The King with good words pacified these Commons, who laying aside weapons, imbraced their pardons.

Commons quest for the rest.

Commotions in Yorkshire.

(96) But this cloud scarfly overblowne, another more dangerous arose in the North, which threatned soarer stormes by the Skies over-cast: for 40000. Rustickes affembled in Yorkshire, furnished with Horse, Armour, Artillery, and Abilements for warre, threatned to set the stay of Estate upon the props of their giddy inventions. Their pretence was Religion, and defence of holy Church, their Banners painted with the five wounds of our Lord, the Challice, the Cake, and other like inventions of Rome, and upon their sleeves was writ the name of the Lord: and so forward and fervent were they in their proceedings, that this their attempt must be termed the holy Pilgrimage. Neither were the Rurall onely guiltie in this rebellion, but others of greater place and degree were associates, namely, Edward Lord Archbishop of York, and the Lord Thomas Darcy, though both of them constrained by the Rebels as the said Archbishop testified under his owne hand: but voluntary and most forward were the Clergy of those parts, the Lord Lumley, Sir Thomas and Sir William Percies, Sir Robert Constable, Sir Francis Bigot, and Sir Robert Nevill, all of them Knights, John Lacy, Richard Beamond, and Robert Bowes Esquiers; the Bayliffes of Snaythe, of Leeds, Kellam, and of Beverly. And for Captaine Generall, was Robert Aske a meane Gentleman, and one Rudstone his associate in the Field. Other Commanders they had out of the common sort, as James Diamond Generall of the Foot, and a poore Fisher-man, styled by himselfe and others, the Earle of Povertie. What authoritie these bare among these rude multitude may partly be perceived by their Mandates, and Commissions, sent forth in their names, and subscribed with their owne hands, as from the Originals of of some of them is here to be seene.

Holy Pilgrimage.

Ex. M.S. in Sir Robert Cotons Library.

The Captaine of the Commotions Letters.

Lords, Knights, Masters, Kinsmen, and Friends, we perceive that ye be informed that this Assemble our Pilgrimage, which we by the favour and mercy of Almighty God intendyth to proceed in, is because the King our Soveraine Lord hath had much impocessions of us, we doubt not but yee doe knowne and remember that to our powers we have beene alwaies as ready in paiments and services to his Highnesse as any his subjects: and further to acertaine you of the cause of our said assemble and pilgrimage is this, That for somuch that such simple and evill-disposed persons being of the Kings Councell, hath not only incensed his Grace with many things which be contrary to the Faith of God, honour of the Kings Majestie, and the Commonwealth of this Realme: and thereby hath destroyed, and yet utterly intendeth to destroy the Church of England, and the Ministers of the same, as ye know so well as we: but also the said Councell hath robbed and spoiled, and further intendyth utterly to rob and spoile the whole body of the Kings Realme, and that as well all you, as us, if God of his infinite mercie had not caused such as hath taken, and hereafter shall take this pilgrimage upon them to proceed in the same: and whether all these things be true or not, we put it to your conscience. And if ye thinke it be true, and fight against us, which intendeth the Comen-wealth of this Realme, and nothing else, we trust yee shall have small speed: For this pilgrimage we have taken hyt for the preservation of Cryste Church of this Realme of England, the King our Soveraigne Lord, the Nobility, Barony and Comens of the same, and to the intent to make petition to the Kings Highnesse for reformation of that which is amisse within this his Realme. And for punishment of Heretickes and Subverters of Lawes; and neither for mony, malice, nor displeasure to any person, but such as be not worthy to remain weere the King our Soveraine Lords person. And further we know if ye should obtaine, as we truste yn God ye shall nat, then ye put both us and you, your heires and ours in bondage for ever; and further ye are sure of the interdiction of Cryste curse, and we cleare, and out of the same: And if we overcome you, ye shall be in our wylls; wherefore for a conclusion, if you will not comen with us for a reformation of the Premisses, we certifie you by this our writing, that we will feyght and dye, both against you, and all those that shall be about-wards to stop us in the said pilgrimage. And God shall shew his Grace and mercy therein: And then ye shall be judged hereafter to be shedars of some of Cryslyn bloud, and destroyers of your owyn Cryslen. From Robert Aske, chiefe Captaine of the Comynalty assembled in pilgrimage, for the Barony and Comynalty of the same.

By me Robert Aske yn the name of all the Comynalty and Barony.

Ex M.S.

Of such terrour and haughtie spirit was this Captaine Aske, that when Lancaster an Herald at Armes, was sent to declare the Kings message in Pomfret Castle (which the Rebels had got by surrender from the Lord Darcy) he so blustred out his answers, that the daunted man excusing himselfe to be but a messenger, fell before him on his knees; till the Archbishop of Yorke tooke him up, saying, it was not beseeming the Coat he wore, to prostrate to any, but only to his Soveraigne. Read likewise if you please this strange Mandate from some mean man among them; the false suggestion that they possessed the ignorant with, and the Oath wherunto these holy Pilgrims were sworn, as I find them recorded by themselves in these very words.

The audacious dealings of the Rebels.

To the Commyns of Hawkeside Parish, Bayliffes, or Constables, with all the Hamlets of the same.

Welbeloved we greet you well, and whereas our brother Poverty, and our brother Rogers, goith forward, is openly for the aid & assistance of your faith, and holy Church, and for the reformation of such Abbeys and Monasteries, now dissolved and suppressed without any just cause. Wherefore gudde brethers, For as much as our said brederyn hath send to us for aide and helpe, we doe not onely effectually desire you, but also under the paine of deadly sinne wee command you, & every of you, to be at the stoke Greene beside Hawkside-Kirke, the Saturday next, being the xxviij. day of October by xj. of the clokke, in your best array: as you will make answer before the heigh Iudge at the dreadfull day of Dome, and in the paine of pulling downe your Houses, and leasing of your gudds, and your bodies to bee at the Capteyns will: For at the place afore said, then and there, yee and wee shall take further direction concerning our faith, so furre decayed, And for good and laudable Customes of the Country, And such naughtie inventions and strange Articles now accepted and admitted, so that our said brother be subdued, they are like to goe furthwards to utter undoing of the Commyn-welth.

The Earle of Shrewsbury maketh against the Rebels.

Slanderous or truethes against the King.

(97) And the more to draw forward the rude multitude, which were forward enough of themselves, they set forth in writing these slanderous untruths against the King.

1 The first is, that no Infant shall receive the blessed Sacrament of Baptisme, bot onlesse an trybett to be payd to the King.

2 The second is, that no man under xxl. Lands shall eyte no brede made of Wheat, ner Capon, Chekyn, Gois, ner Pigge, bott onlesse to pay a trybett to the King.

3 The third is, that for every ploghe-land the King will have entrybett, with other diverse extreme urgent causes, and hertely fare ye well.

Thomas Duke of Norfolke, Lord Lieutenant of the North.

The

The oath of the Pilgrims.

The Oath of the holy Pilgrimes.

Ye shall nat enter into this our Pilgrimage of Grace for the Commyn-welthe, but only for the love that you clo bere unto Almighty Godde, his faith, & to holy Churche militant, the maintenance thereof, to the preservation of the Kings person, his issew, to the purifying of Nobilitie, and to expulse all vilayne blode, and evill Councellers against the Commyn-welthe, from his Grace and the privie Counsell of the same, and that ye shall nat enter into our said Pilgramege, for no particular profite to your self, nor to do no displeasure to no privey person, but by Councell for the Commyn-welthe, ner slee, ner murder for no envye, but in youre hertis put away all feare and dread, and take afore you the Crosse of Cristе, and in your herts his faith, the restitution of the Churche, the suppresion of these Heretyks, and their opynyons, by all the holle contents of this Booke.

And for the observation of this Oath, heare another command of the Commissioners, as we finde it recorded.

To the Bayliffes and Communes of the Towne of Skarboro.

Welbelovyd, we Francys Bygod Knighte, and John Halom yoman, in the name of all the Cómunes, commande & charde you, that ye assemble your selves together mediately upon recepete hereof, and so take thys othe wychys we here send unto yow, and then after in all haste possible to assist and hayde theis over brethren, wome we sende to you to keepe, & make sure the Castell, Towne, and Port of Skarboro, that no man enter into the same Castel, that belongys unto Rafe Evers the yonger knyghte, nor any outher whiches did not take full parte with the Communes, at over first and last assemblynge, in whoys name, authority, or attorney, soever they come, unlesse they have licence of all the Communes, in like manner, ye shall truely keepe all sichys ordinance, and shippe to the use of the Communes, wythe wyches we charde you at our late being here, and thys not to faile, upon paine of yower lyves, ye shall refer credence unto thys messengeres, thus in hast: Fare ye well, from Settrynton this Mondaye Sancte Mawris daye.

Francis Bygott Knight, in the name, and by commandement of all the Communes.

Against these rout of Rebels George Earle of Shrewesbury mustred his men, not staying for the Kings commission, wch made him much suspected, he meant to have sided with the Pilgrims himselfe. To cleare wch aspersions, he made this short (but loyal) Oration unto his followers, before he entred further into the field.

"How soever these Rebels colour their pretences for "the Weale-publike, and would draw in others to "participate with them; yet certaine it is, that Trai-"tors they be, and traiterously doe prosecute what "they wickedly begun. Follow them who list in this "lawlesse enterprize; But I for mine own part meane "not to staine my bloud and Ancestors by joyning "my means wth such a fort of Raskals, but will rather "live & die in defence of the Crown; yea, if it stood "but upon a stake. Therfore those that will take my "part in these businesses, let them follow me; and if "any here amongst you be otherwise minded, let "him depart; but looke for no more favour then the "Hatchet and Halter will afford him. And then in "the sight of them all he caused his Chaplain to ad-"minister him an oath of his loyalty unto the King.

It was likewise reported that the Earle of Darby was set forward towards them, whom the Pilgrimes well hoped would have sided with them, as by their Mandate sent to the Brethren appeares, where is forbid that none of them should aide him, unlesse he tooke the oath: which he never meant to

Also, that it may be enacted by authority of Parliament, that all recognisans, statutys, penalyes newly forfeyted during the tyme of the Commission may be pardoned and discharged, as well against the King as stranger.

These were the instructions given to their Commissioners to be conserred upon; all wch as it should seeme, were drawn into foure Articles or heads, as by the minute of the Kings answere thereunto doth appeare. Which originall wholly penned by King Henries owne hand, I have here inserted word for word, to shew his learned care both for Church and Common-wealth: the originall it selfe remaineth in the Liberary of the worthy Sir Robert Cotton Knight Baneret, the storer of all learned Antiquities.

Answare to the demands of the Rebellys in Yorkeshire.

The first Artic.

First, as touching the maynrenance off the fayth, the termys be soo generall that hard they be to be answard. But yf they meane the fayth off Chryst, to which all Christen men be most oblygyd, we declare and protest our selfe to be he that alwayes do, & have myndyd to dy and lyve in the puryte off the same, & declare that no man can or dare sett hys fote by ours in provyng off the contrary: marvelyng not a lytyll that Ignorant pepole wyll goo abowght, or take upon them to instructe us (which sume thyng have bene noted to be lerned) what the ryght fayth shold be. Or that they wold be so ingrate & unnaturall to us theyre moft ryghtfull King, with owght any our desart, upon falle reports and surmysys to suspecte us off the same, and gyffe rather credence to forgyd light talys, then to the approved traght by us thys xxviii yers usyd, and by our deds approved.

The second Article.

To the seconde, wch tochythe the maynrenance off the chyrche, & lybertes off the same, thys is so genera aproposycion that withowgt distinctions no man wth trawght can answare it nother. For first, the Chyrche whiche they mene must be knowne. Secondly, whether they lawfull or unlawfull lybertes whych they require, I mene both by Gods law, and laws off the Realm. And thes know I dowght not but they shal be answarde, according to Gods Law, equite and Justice.

The third Article.

The thirde tochyth three things, the laws, the Cõmune-welthe, the directors off the lawes under us. Tochyng the laws, we expresly dare testyfy that blind men denying no colers, nor yet being Judgges, it shall be duly provie that there were never in any of our predisessours dayes so many holsome commodius and benyfficiall acts made for the Commen-welthe, and yet I mene syns theyre tyme that wolde fayne have thanke withowght desert. For our Lord forbedde (seyng we have bene this xxviii. yere your King) that both wee and our Counsell shuld have lost so muche tyme, as not to know now better then whē we came first to our raigne, what were the Commenwelthe, & what the self-conceit were not, & thought the owtherquedance of sume may chance wil nott let them to knowledge it so; yet I trust and dowght nott but the most part of our lovyng Subjects (specially thos which be not seducyd by falle report, do bothe thynke it, accept it, & fynde it so.) Now tochyng to the Commune-welthe, what King hath kept yow all hys subjects so longe, in welthe & peace so long, without owght takyng or doyng wrong, whon to the other so indifferently mynyster justice to all bothe hye & low; Soo defendyd you all frome owght ward enemyes, so fortyfyed the fronters off the Realme, to his no lityll and in a manner inestimable cargs, and all for your welthes & surtes. What king hath gyffen among you mo generall or frear pardons. What Kyng hath be lother to punyshe his subjects, or shewde more marcy amoft them? These thyngs beyng so trew, as no trew man can deny them, it is an unnaturall and unkynd demenour of you our Subjects to beleve or deme the contrary of it, by hous report soo ever it should be. As tochyng the begynning of our Rayne, wher ye say fo meny Nobyllmen were Counselers, hoo were the Counselers I well remember, and yet off the Temporalte I notte non but two wordy callyng Nobyll, the won Tresourer of Tngland, & the other hye Stuward off our others, as the* Lord Marney & Darcy, but sars wel-borne Gentylmen, & vet off no grett lands, till they were promotyd by me, & soo made knyghts and Lords, the rest wer Lawyers and Prestes, save two Bishopys, whyche wer Canterbyry and Wyncheſter. Yf these then be the grett Nobyllmen ye specke off, and ye semed then to be content withall, why then nowe be ye not muche better coment with us, whyche have now so meny Nobills in dedd, bothe of byrth byrth and condyssion. For first off the temporalyte in our preve Consell, we have the Duke of Norfolke, the Duke of Suffolke, the Markes of Exceter, the Lorde Steward (where he may come) the Erle off Oxford, the Erle off Sussex, the Lord Sandes our Chamberlayn, the Lord Admyrall Tresourer off our House, Sir Willyam Paulet Controler off our House: And off spirituall the B. off Hereford, Chychester, and Wynchester. Now loke how fare ye be abused to recõne that then there wer more Nobyll men in our previe Consell, than now. But yet though I nowe do declare the truche, to pull yow fro the blyndenes that you wer leddin, yet we ensure we wolde ye knoo, that it appartayneth nothing to any off oure subjects to poynte us our Consel, ne we wolde take it soo at your hands. Wherfore hensefourth remember better the dutys off subjects to your king and Soverayne, and meddle not off that whych ye have nothyng to do in. And in case it be but a false and untrue report (as we verely thynk it is) then it were as mette, and standyth as well with justice, that they shulde have the self-same punishment whyche wrongfully hath objectyd thys to them that they shulde have had, if they deservyd it. And won thyng amonst others makyth me thynk that this slander shuld be untrw, by cause it procedyth frome that place whyche is bothe so fer distant frome wher they inhabite, & also frome thos peple whyche never hard them preche, nor yet knowght any part off theyre cõversation: We fore we exorte ye our Commons to be no more so lyght off credit, nother off ill thynges spoken off your kyng & Soverayn, nor yet off any off his Prelats or Consellers; but to thynke that your Kyng having soo long raynyd over you, hath as good discression to electe and cheuse his Consellers, as thes hoo ever they be that hath put thys in your hedds.

Here in this fynall poynt whyche ye our Cõmons off Yorkshire do desyre it, and also in the mator off the hole we verely thynke, that the rest off our hole Cõmones (wheroff ye be in maner bue an handfull) wyll gretely disdayn, & nott bere that ye take uppon ye, to set order bothe to them & us your bothe Soverayne, & that (thowght ye be rebelles) you wolde make thē as berers and part takers off your mysclieffe, wyllyng them to take pardō for insurrection, whyche verely I thynke, & dowght nott they never myndyd, but like trw subjects to the contrary, hathe bothe with hart & dede bene redy att our call to defende bothe vs & thē selfe. And now for our part, as to your demandes, we let you wyt, that pardon of such thyngs as ye demand liett wonly in the wyl & pleasure off the Prince: But it semyth by your leaude Proclamations, & save condutes, that there be amongst you who take upon them bothe the Kings, and Consellers parts, whyche nother yet by us, nor by consent off the Realme, hath bene admytted to any suche rome. What arrogansy then is in thos wretches (being also of none experiens) to presume to raise ye outr subjects with owght Commission or auctorye, ye, and agaynst us, under a clokyd colur off your welthe, & in our name: And as the succes wyll declare (we benyng no more mersiful then ye hytherto do desarve) to yours other confusions. Wherfore we lett you wytt, ye our subjects off Yorkeshire, that were it not that our pryncely hart can nott recõne thys your shamfull insurrection & unnaturall rebellyon to be done off malice, or rancore, but rather by a lyghtnesse gyffen in a maner by a naghty nature to a Communalte, & a wonderus sodeyne surreption off Gentylmē, we must nedes have exeecuted another maner of punishment then (ye humbelyng knowlegyng your faults, and submyttyng your selfes to our marcy) we intend to doo. And to the intente that ye shal al know, that our Pryncely hart rather inbraseth (off his awne dispoficion) pite & compassiō off his offending subjects, then wyll to be revenged off theyre naghte deddes, we are contented, yff we may see and parfave in you all a forofulnes for your offensys, and will henceforth to do nere soo, nor to beleve soo leaude & nawghty tales or reports off your most kynd & lovyng Prynce, & hys Consell, to grant unto you all our Letter Pattens off pardon for this rebellion; so that ye wil deliver unto us shuche off the ryngleders and provokers off you to thys rebellion, as we shall affyne to you & poynt. Now note the benyngnyte off your Prince. Now note how easily ye maye have pardone bothe Gentylmen, and other, yff ye list. Now note, how effusion off blude maye be exchuyd. Now note what thys lytyll wyle off your rebellyon hath hynderyd your selfes and Contre. Now lerne by a lytyll lake to exchew a worse. Now lerne by thys smalle warnyng to kepe yow trw men. Thus I as your hed, praye for you my members, that God may light yow with hys grace to knowlege, and declare your selfes our trw subjects hensforth; and to gyff more credence to thes our benyng perswasions, then to the parvarse instigations of malicius disposed parsons.

Fynys.

The effect that the Kings reply wrought, is manifest by his free pardons sent unto the offenders, by Proclamation divulged by his messenger at Armes, and his Trumpet throughout the North parts, the tenour whereof from the Originall is, as followeth.

King Henries free pardon by Proclamation.

All bee yt, that yowe the Kings Subjects and Commons dwelling & inhabiting in the Shires of York, Cumberland, Westmerland, Northumberland, the Bishoprickes of Durham, the City of Yorke, and the shire of the same, the Towne of Kyngeston upon Hull, and the Shire of the same, the Towne of Newcastle upon Tyne, and the Shire of the same, and in other Shires, Townes, Dalis, Places privileged, the Fraunchises and Liberties within the limits of the said Shires, Cities, and Townes, or any of them, or being reputed or taken for any part, parcell or number of any of them, and such other the Kings said Subjects, inhabited in the Towne of Lancaster, or elswhere by North, in the Shire of Lancaster, have now of late attempted and committed manifest and open rebellion, against his most royall Magestly, whereby was like to have ensewde the utter renwn and destruction of thes hole Cuntreis, to the grete comforte and avancement of your auncient enemies the Scots, which as his Heines is credably informed, doe with a great Redines wache upon the same, and to the high displeasure of God, who streitly commandeth you to obay your Soveraign Lord and King, in all things, and not with violence to resist his will, or commandement, for any cause what soever it be: Nevertheles the Kings royall Majestie, perceyving as well by the Articles of their partners sent to his Heines: As also dewly enformed by credible reports, that their said offences proceeded of ignorance, and by occasion of sundrie false tails, never minded or intended by his Heines, or any of his Councell, but most craftily contrived, and most spitefully set abroade amonges you, by certaine malitious and sedicious persons; and thereupon his Highnes inclined to extend his most gratious mercy and pitty towards you, having chefe charge of you under God, both of your sowles & bodies, and desiring rather the preservation of the same, and our reconciliation, by his meriefull meyns than by the order and rigour of Justice to punish you according to your demerys, of his inestimable goodnesse, benignity, mercy, and pety, and at your most humble petitions and submissions made unto his Highnes hee is content and plaised to gife and grant, and by his present Proclamation doth gyve & grant unto you all, and to all & every your confederates where soever they dwell, of estate, degree, or what condition soever you, or they be, or by what name, or names soever they, or you be, or may be called, his generall & free pardon, for all maner of treasons, rebellions, insurrections, misprisions of treasons, murders, robberies, felons, and of all accessaries of the same, & of every of them, unlawfull assembles, unlawfull conventicles, unlawfull speaking of words, confederacies, riats, rowts: And all other trespasses, offencies, and contempts, done and committed by you, or any of you against the Kings Majestie, his Crowne or dignity royal, within, and from the time of the beginning of the saide Rebellion whensoever it was, unto the present day of proclaiming of this Proclamation, and of all paines, judgements, and executions of death, & all other penalties, forfeitures, fynes, and forfeitures of Landes, Tenements, Hereditaments, Goods or Cattels, by any of your forfeitures incurred by reason of the premises, or any of them, which Fines, Forfeitures, Landes, Tenements, Hereditaments, Goodes and Cattels, the Kinges said Highnes of his speciall grace, and mere motion by these presents, giveth to such of you, as have or should have forfeited, or lost the same, by occasion of the premisses, or any of them: And also his Highnes is pleased, and contented, that you, & every of you, from time to time, shall, and may have upon your sewtes to be made hereafter in his Chauncery, his said most gracious and free pardon under his great Seale concerning the premisses, without any further Bill or Warrant to be obtained for the same, & without paying any thing for the great Seale therof: And that you, and every of you, from time to time, may freely and liberally sewe for his said pardon, when and as often as it shall like you, without any trouble, vexation or impeachment for the premisses, or any of them, by his heires, or by any of his Officiaries, Ministers, or Subjects by any manner of meanes or in any manner of wise. Provided alwayes, that you and every of you in token of a perfect declaration & knowledge, that you do heartily lament and be sorrie for the said offencies, shall make your humbly submission of his Highnes, in the presence of his right trustie and right intirely beloved Cosens and Councellairs: the Duke of Norfolcke, and the Earle of Shrewsbury his Lieutenants Generall, or any of them, or to their Deputy or Deputies of them, or any of them, or such other person, or persons as the Kings Highnes shall appoint for the same: Furthermore, the Kings most Royall Majestie, streitely chargeth and commandeth, that you, and every of you, shall from henceforth, like true and faithfull Subjects use your selves, in Gods peace, and his, according to the duties of allegeance, and that you shall in no wise hereafter, attempt to make, or procure, any such rebellion, intent, unlawfull Assemblies, Riots, Rowts, and Conspirations, nor at the Commandement, nor by the authority of any person, of what estate, or degree, or for what cause soever it be, shall arise in any forcible manner, and array, unlesse it be at the speciall commandement of the Kings Highnes, or his Lieutenant, sufficiently auctorised for the same. In witnes whereof the Kings most Royall Majestie, hath caused this his Proclamation to be made Patent, and sealed with his great Seale at Richemonte the IX. day of December in the XXVIII. yeare of his Reigne 1536.

Pexfall.

Notwithstanding this generall pardon & merciful dealings of the King, a new insurrection was raised in the North, wherein many of the former were now again Actors, as by name, Robert Aske, whom the King had not onely pardoned, but also highly rewarded, the Lord Dacres, Sir Robert Constable, Sir Francis Bygod, Palmer, Percy, Hamilton, Tempest, and Lumley, all of them put to death, as they well deserved.

Hollinsh. f. 944. Aske executed.

(99) In which Commotions those men whose profession was onely the Booke and their Beades, mistaking Christs meaning, who bad his Disciples to sell their coate, and to buy a sword, came armed among the Rebels into the Field, and with them were taken as Traitors against the Crowne: for which offence many of them suffered death: namely, John Paslew, Abbot of Whaley in Lincolneshire, John Castegate, and William Haydocke, Monks of the same House, Robert Hobs, Abbot of Woborne in Bedfordshire, Adam Sudbury, Abbot of Gervaux, with Assbeed a Monke of that house; the Abbot of Sawley in Lancashire, and the Prior of the same place, William Wold, Prior of Birlington, the Parson of Pudington, five Priests of Lincolnshire, and with them their Chiefetaine, Captaine Cobler, and John Allen Priest.

Luke 22.36. Spirituall men Commotioners. Monkes hanged for Rebellion.

(100) These stirres thus quieted, and the Statesmen at leasure to prevent the like, a Comission came forth to purge the Churches of Idols; and to suppresse the Monasteries, to the Kings use, granted unto him by Parliament: the one of them the only working cause, through the gain that was got by ignorant devotion, and gadding on pilgrimage, and the other, the Nest & very receptacle of all traiterous attempters, against the peace of the Land, and supremacy of the Crown. The abuse of the first was solemnly shewed at Pauls Crosse in London, upon Sunday the twenty-foure of February, by Doctor John Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, where the Roode of Boxley in Kent, commonly called the Roode of Grace (made with divers vices to bow downe, and to lift up it selfe, to shake, and to stir both Head, hands, and feet, to rowle the eyes, moove the lips, and to bend the browes,) was then broken and pulled in peices. So likewise the Images of our Lady of Walsingham and Ipswich, set and besprinkled with Iewels, & Gemmes, with divers others, both of England and Wales, were brought to London, and burnt at Chelsy before the Lord Crumwell. Then the Axes of the hewers began to cast downe the walles of all Monasteries, whose number (as Camden doth account them) were six hundred forty five, besides foure score and ten Colledges, them of Oxford and Cambridge not accounted: Of Hospitals one hundred and ten, and of Chaunteries and free Chappels two thousand three hundred seaventy foure, all of them almost were then borne downe with the sudden deluge of those tepestuous times, whilst the world stood amazed, King Henry proceeded, & the Clergy-men groaned under their own destructions: Among these the Shrine of Thomas Becket was defaced, which did abound with more the Princely riches, whose meanest part was pure gold, garnished with many precious stones, as Erasmus that saw it, hath written, whereof the chiefest was a rich Gemme of France, offered by King Lewis, who asked & obtained (you may be sure, he buying it so dear) that no passenger betwixt Dover and Whitesand, should perish by shipwracke, his bones by Stephen Langton had beene laid in a golden Shrine, his name canonized, & the day of his death made annually holy, such concourse of Pilgrims, such pressing to touch him, and such creeping and kneeling to his Tombe, that the prints of their devotion, in the Marble stones, remaines to this day; every pillar resounding the miracles of this reputed Martyr, and the Church it selfe dedicated to Christ, forced to give place to the name of Saint Thomas. The Timberwork of this Shrine was covered with plates of gold, damasked & embossed with wires of gold, garnished with broches, images, angels, precious stones, & great Orient Pearles: all these defaced, filled two Chests, & were for price of an unestimable value. But in steed of these Dagons, the Bible in English was commanded to be read in all Churches, and Register Bookes of Weddings, Christenings, and Burials in every of them to be kept.

(101) The yerely revenues of these, as they were valued by the Cõmissioners, at their subversiõs, amounted to an unestimable summe, as appeareth by the Originall Booke it selfe, presented to the King, whereof more shall be spoken in the end of this Chapter, and yet most of them rated at Robin-hoods pennyworths, what their rents were, a libell scattered abroad, and read to the King, by demonstration did prove, wherein was accounted, that unto the five Orders of Friers, (every housholder paying them five pence the Quarter) the summe of forty three thousand three hundred thirty three pound, six shillings & eight pence sterling, was paid them by yeare, besides therenewes of their owne lands, which was not a little; so that not without cause many entred into a Monasticall life, rather to live at full, and without cares of this world, then to feed the flock of Christ, or to win them, & not theirs, after the example of the Apostle. For the Testament of Christ, was unto most of these, as a book sealed with seven seales, and their mouthes unmuzled they did devoure, but not tread out the corn, so that the Sun by their doctrine seemed to be darkened, as with smoake, and themselves to be the Locusts that over-spred the superficies of the Earth, whose faces were like men, pretending humanity, their haire like women in shew of modesty, their Crownes of counterfeited gold, signifying their usurped authority, their teeth like Lions shewing their Tyranny, their force like Horses prepared for battell, their habergions of Iron betokening their strength, the sound of their wings, the thundring out of their mandates like to the rumbling of Chariots in warre, their Tayles (the false prophets) having stings like unto Scorpions, Scorpions, and their King the bad Abaddon, even the Angell of the Bottomles pit. All those allusions most aptly fitting these Cloystered Friers, who now grown to the height of their sinnes, their skirts were discovered, that their shame might appeare, being the onely men then laid open to the world. For besides the idle ignorance and voluptuous excesse of these Cloystered votaries, their monasticall sensualities afforded a shamefull discovery of wicked adulteries & filthy Sodomites: whose sins, as they then stayned the world to their Cels overthrown, so let their remembrance stain that religion wch debars the bed of lawfull marriage, and dispenseth with such crying, & too monstrous sins. A Catalogue of whose names (if the Inke staine not the Paper wherein they stand) shall stand a Record of their filthy shame, as long as Inke is to be read upon Paper. Take them then from his testimony that tooke them out of an English Book, containing an Inventory (or Catalogue) of the villanies discovered in the Visitations of Monasteries, Covents Collegiate Churches, and other Religious Houses in England, by command, of King Henry the eight; wherein the whoredomes, adulteries, incests, and filthy Sodomies of the Monkes, Friers, and Priests, both names and surnames are written, as followeth.

But saith mine Author, the Catalogue of such whoremasters, & adulterers is too long to record: for those Cloystred Monkes, & Friers, from 600 Covents (almost) scrawling about the land by auricular confessiõ got into the bosomes of simple sinning wõmen, & defloured the beds of many better men. And the wanton Nunnes likewise dallying with them in the darke, brought forth the fruits of darknesse, as was found in finding many Infants bones in many of their Cells. Whose wickednesse (as the Ammonites) being now full, the Maule of Gods Iustice beate downe the walls of their shelters, and the sword of his wrath so cut the cords of their strength asunder, as that Idoll of Rome hath had his crowne crushed, and his authority shortned in all the Christian world ever since.

(102) Against these and their doctrine in former times (besides many others in other forrein parts) two in the dayes of King Henry the fourth, the first English King that put any to death for the doctrine of Rome; (omitting Sir Iohn Oldcastle and others, that died for the Gospels defence, in the dayes of K. Henry the fift) foure in the raigne of innocent Henry the sixt. One in the dayes of King Edward the fourth, and ten in the time of K. Hen. the seventh, sealed the doctrine against the papall religion with their bloud, all of them being martyred before that Martin Luther wrote. And in the raigne of this King 26 suffered the fire, before the flames thereof could be quenched, which a while was done by the meanes of good Queene Anne, till afterwards they mounted higher, when the sixe Articles there made: but because this Ecclesiasticall Text is handled elsewhere, and seemeth unsociable to our begun Subject, we will referre the Reader for these matters unto the industrious paines of that worthy and ever-venerable man Mr. Fox, taken in his Acts and Monuments of Ecclesiasticall History.

Many suffered death for the Gospell before that Martin Luther wrote.

Queene Anne Bulen a favourer of the Gospell, stayed the rage against the Professors.

(103) The Monasteries thus dissolved, and the revenewes therof converted to reporall uses, K. Henry ran in great obloquie of many forraine Potentates, but most especially of the Pope; who with Card. Poole instigated divers Princes in Christendome to invade England, thus fallen from his faith: Yea, and homeborn Subjects disliking the course for Papisticall subversion, by secret working sought to deprive K. Henry and to raise up Reynold Poole unto the Regall dignity, as by their inditements appeareth. The persons convicted, were L. Henry Courtney Marquesse of Excester, & Earle of Devonshire, the son of L. Katherine the seventh daughter of K. Edward the 4. Henry Poole Lord Montacute, with Sr. Geffrey his brother, and Sr. Edward Nevill brother to the L. of Abergavenny. These Pooles were the sons of L. Margaret Countesse of Salisbury, the only daughter of George Duke of Clarence: and of these Reynold Poole once Deane of Excester, and now Cardinall at Rome, was accounted the onely man.

(104) And this forefaid Lord Marquesse had formerly been in such favour with K. Henry, that at his going into France he ordained him his heire apparant, though at his returne, upon grave deliberation, he saw it better policy to plucke him downe then was used in setting him up, left in acting his part upon that infective stage, he put the land to as much trouble as the arreared D. Richard of Yorke had done, after hee was ordained heire-apparant, which Title produced the Tragedy of his raiser K. Henry the fixt, and now having him, and his Abettors upon the advantage, the better to secure his owne Estate, he caused the heads of this L. Marquesse, with the L. Montacute, and Sir Edward Nevill to be cut off upon Tower-hill.

(105) The King then a Widower, since the death of Q. Iane, who departed this life two yeares before, meant to maintain what he had done, maugre all opposites: wch the better to effect, by the Councell of Lord Crommel, he fought and obtained the alliance of the Princes of Germany, and heard the motion for marriage with the Lady Anne, sister to Williams Duke of Cleve, whose other sister Frederick D. of Saxony had espoused, a great favorer of the Gospell, and maintainer of Mart. Luther the zealous Preacher & professor thereof. But whether Frederick for the death of Anne Bullen, or that he would have his wives sister bestowed nearer at home (which thing he pretended) a great hinderer hee was of that match. But the L. sent into England, and married unto K. Henry, seemed nothing pleasing in his eye; which Stephen Gardner then Bishop of Winchester perceiving, thought it a fit subject for him to worke upon, against the L. Crommell the maker of the match, he therefore instigated lealousies daily into the Kings care, first exasperating the hatred of the Princes of Germany to him-wards, and especially of D. Frederick his compulsive brother in Law, the Emperour, French King, the Scots, and the Pope, all seeking at once to raise their powers against England. The civill tumults lately passed, and new commotions greatly to be feared, he letted not to remember, and all to nip the Spring of the new-spreading Gospell, whereby this wise Politician in the end got fixe such Articles against it, as the Consistory of Hell could devise no worse. Whose cruelties were such, that not long after, and in the daies of this King, some of those Acts of Parliaments were againe repealed; and some of them qualified, as roo sharpe and searching into the bloud of the Kings best Subjects.

(106) The fruit of these bloud-thirsty Instigators, the Lord Cromwell, and Lady Anne of Cleve soone tasted of, he by imprisonment and death, and she by disgrace and divorce; having been his wife from January to June, in all which time the King refrained the mutuall knowledge of her body, for the dislike hee had of her person, even at the first sight, as himselfe called to witnesse the Lord Cromwell then prisoner in the Tower, for whose report he wrote a Letter with his owne hand; and she good Lady (no other cause alleaged) was divorced by Parliament, when also it was enacted, that she should no longer be stiled Queene. The Lord Cromwell was charged by the Lord Rich, and Sir George Throgmorton, with speaking of certaine generall words, not excepting therein the Kings person, which nevertheless were thought too sleight, & insufficient to take away his life, that his enemies feared to put it to the triall of his Peeres, lest he should be acquitted by them, as the Lord Dacres of the North not many yeares before had beene; wherefore there was a Bill drawne to attaint him of heresie, and Treason, in generall words, rather then in particular prooses, which when hee was dead, passed in both Houses of Parliament with the Kings assent.

In a letter written by himselfe. Ex M.S. Anno 32. H.8. cap. 25. Queene Anne divorced by Parliament.

(107) Howbeit Sanders, that seldome speakes wel of the Gospels professors, will have him to die for the breach of a Law made himselfe, which was, that one appeached of Treason should not come in the Kings presence, till he had tried himselfe not guilty; but besides that, we find no such Act by him made: his indictement doth not charge him with treason, but with setting at liberty certain persons committed for misprision of treason and heresie; for favouring and maintaining the translation of heretical books into English; for bearing out Barnes, and other heretical Preachers; that himselfe was an hereticke, and had spoken words, great words for the upholding of his said Religion, which were, That the King should not change it if he would: for these things he was attainted by Parliament of high Treason, and that grounded either upon a Statute made in the five and twentie of Edward the third, or else by the explanation of that Act which refereth the exposition of Treasons to the Parliament, and so no way did Cromwell devise or make any law of treason, which himselfe first fell into, as that partiall Romanist hath said.

(108) But most sure it is, that the Kings affection, altogether guided by the faireſt object, found no other point in the Compasse to fixe his variable eye, besides that only, wch to his seeming was touched by the Loadstone of nature, and the same to be the Lady Katherine Howard daughter to Edward the brother of Thomas Duke of Norfolke; against whom Cromwell standing in the defence of Queene Anne, and using words of dislike in the Lady Katherine, distasteful unto the King, was thereupon apprehended (his enemy so working) and upon the 28. of July suffered death with the stroke of the Axe upon Tower-hill, with whom was beheaded the Lord Hungerford of Heitesbury, neither so Christianly suffering, nor so quietly dying for his offence committed against nature.

No such things as Sanders supposeth against Cromwell.

And the Lord Leonard Gray in this presnt yeare lost his head for treason, the twenty eight of June. And the next day following, Thomas Fines, Lord Dacres of the South, dyed at Tyborne for killing a private man in a fray. Neither was it put up, untill that the heads of Queene Katherine Howard, and the Lady Jane Rochford were stricken off, the one for adultery, the other for concealement, as was alleadged; the parties offending were Francis Dereham, and Thomas Culpepper, Dereham before she was Queene, and Culpepper after; who both were executed at Tyburne the 10 of December, and the 12 of February following. Mistresse Katherine Howard (for so in the Act of her Attainture she is called) who had beenstiled and received Queen for the space of six moneths, and foure dayes, with the Lady Jane then widdow, & late wife unto George Bullen, L. Rochford, were both of them brought unto a Scaffold, raised upon the hill within the Tower, where they in lamentable passions suffered death.

(110) Howsoever those times afforded such Queenes to the Kings bed, or himselfe unfortunate in making his choise: yet many of no mean judgement have rather accused King Henry for his changing and variable affections, then thinke them guilty in the breach of Matrimony. Of Anne we have seene what hath been said, and of this Queene let us heare what shee professed after her condemnation to Doctor White Bishop of Winchester, her last Confessor, and by him delivered to a noble yong Lord of her name, and neere alliance: Her words were these: As to the act (my reverend Lord) for which I stand condemned, God and his holy Angels I take to witnesse upon my soules salvation, that I die guiltlesse, never having so abused my Soveraignes bed: what other sins, and follies of youth I have committed, I will not excuse; but am assured that for them God hath brought this punishment upon me, and will in his mercy remit them, for which I pray you pray with me, unto his Sonne, and my Saviour Christ.

Saunders three converſions.

These Statutes (I say) as well the one as the other, brought many to their ends, wch otherwise were very good Subjects, & worthy instruments in the common weale: for offending in the first, there dyed Bishop Fisher, and Sir Thomas More, besides many Abbors, Priors, and Friers, and among them, in Smithfield the Welsh roode set Frier Forrest on fire, according to the prophesie very rife in their mouthes, That this holy roode should set a whole Forrest on fire. For the ether, suffered in flames, may godly Christians, whereof Robert Barnes a Reverend Doctor and worthy Minister

John Fisher. Sir Thomas More beheaded.

Minister of Christ, the first reducer (as Mr. Fox reporteth) of the Vniversity of Cambridge from rudenes and barbarousnes, unto good literature and learning, was with the first: And Anne Askew, a Gentlewoman of an incomparable dexterity one of the last, who, above the weakenesse of her Sexe most valiantly stood against the violence of the time.

The Queene feeth the sentence of her death.

(112) Her birth was worshipfull, and education accordingly; bestowed in marriage, unto John Kyme a Gentleman in Lincolneshire, and commended by Bale for her rare wit, and elegant beauty; which her parts the penfill of N. D. with his un-even hand, (ever over-hard to shadow the truth,) hath slanderously blurred, and measured those graces in her, by his own loose affections, and those wanton Votaries, which in the height of sinne had changed the naturall use of women against nature.

Queene Katherine sirnamed the King, who falleth in conference with her about religion.

This young beiser (saith he) abiding no yoake, a coy dame, and of very evill fame, left the company of Master Kyme, to gad up and downe a Gospelling, and Gossipping where she might, and ought not, but especially in London, and neere the Court, now she being faire, and but twenty five yeares old at her death, doth easily shew what may be suspected of her life, and the mysticall speeches and demands of the Kings Councell touching her departure from her husband, were grounded upon somewhat, especially in that shee called her selfe Anne Askew, alias Kyme. Thus farre this scandalizing man hath accuited this holy Anne, by the outward appearance of her youth and beauty: as holy Anna, by Eli, was accused of drunkennesse when her heart was most fervent, in supplications to her God; and his partiall pen, made the Fan to sift the Wheat of her holy conversation to find out some Chaffe, whereof none is free, nor is she to be condemned upon the imagerie of his suspicious head (who undoubtedly would have told all if any thing could have beene found) whereas she in the vigour of beauty and weakenesse of her Sexe, resisted the gaine-layers of the truth with her deareſt bloud: testifying from the Prisons her faith and constancy, and from the Racke preached Christ, whereon most unhumanely and againſt kinde, she was twice tormented; and lastly, sealed her testimony in Smithfield, through the flames of fire: being borne to the place of her death in a Chaire, her bones so disjoynted by the Racke that she could not goe.

Act. and Mon. Queene Katherines wife an Inverce.

(113) The irreverend * N. D. whose affection to Christs Gospell and loyalty to the English Crowne hath sufficiently shewed it selfe, to make her no Martyr, and that her life did demerit the Racke, saith that the King himselfe commanded that torture to be inflicted, for infecting with her erroneous doctrine, his Court, his Neeces, Suffolkes Daughters, and his Queene. Whereas the truth tels us, that the Lieutenant refusing to racke her the second time, was threatned by Wriothesley Lord Chancellor (who did it himselfe) to be complained of to the King, who immediately tooke Boate, and told the whole Tragedy; whereof King Henry seemed to be sore offended, for using a Woman with such inhumane tortures. But such favours had the Popes Chickens under the shroud of the Church, and wing of this Monarch, that they feared not to follow the appeale of death, even upon her that slept in his owne bosome, which was Queene Katherine Parre, espoused unto him some three yeares before, and whom (as this States intelligencer doth confesse) he meant to have burned had he longer lived. For the truth is (saith hee) that the Kings sicknesse and death shortly ensuing was the chiefe cause of her escape; and the error of the Lord Chancellor Wriothesley, who let fall out of his bosome the Kings hand and Commission for carrying her to the Tower, gave occasion (the paper found and brought her) to goe and humble her selfe to the King; the principall occasion against her, was Heretical Bookes, found in her closet, both brought and sent her by Anne Askew, whereof the witnesses were the Lady Herbert, Lady Iane, Lady Tyrwit, and others. Indeed it is true that by Gods providence such papers were let fall out of the Lord Chancellors bosome, containing certain articles against her, with a warrant to commit her to the Tower, whereunto the Kings hand was subscribed: which being found, was presently brought unto the Queene, whereof the unexpected contents so deepely touched her tender heart, that forthwith shee fell into great feares, laments, and a most heavy melancholy, and was in such danger of death, that the King came to visit her, having not gone forth of his Chamber of many daies before; whereat she so rejoyced, as she began to amend: and to acknowledge her like love and dury, the next night following, repayred to the Kings Bed-chamber, accompanied onely with the Lady Herbert her sister, and the Lady Iane the Kings neece, carrying the Candle before her, of whose presence the King seemed to be most desirous; and presently falling in talke of Religion, began to debate some questiion thereof with the Queene, demanding to have her resolutions therein; but she knowing that his nature was not to be croſt, and the soreneſſe of his legge to encreaſe his choller, made him answere, that she was a woman, accompanied with many imperfections, but his Majesty wise and judicious, of whom she must learne, as of her Lord and Head, for so God hath appointed you (said she) the Supreame Head of us all, of whom next unto him I will ever learne. Not so, by Saint Mary, said the King, you are become a Doctor Kate to instruct us, and not to be instructed by us, as often heretofore we have seene. Indeed (said she) if your Majesty have so conceived, I have beene mistaken in my meaning, who have ever held it preposterous for a woman to instruct her Lord. And whereas I have heretofore held talke with your highnesse touching Religion, it was to learne of your Majesty some excellent point which my selfe stood in doubt of: and sometimes to the end that you might with lesse griefe passe over this painfull time of your infirmity, wherein if by my over-much boldnesse I have failed in the latter, yet have I not done in the former, to my no small benefit and comfort. And is it even so sweet heart? (quoth the King,) why then, are we friends, and so kissing her, gave her leave to depart. But the day drawne on for her apprehension, and the King disposed take the ayre, sent for the Queene to walke in the garden, himselfe accompanied onely with two Gentlemen, and she with the three forefaid Ladies. When as suddenly the Lord Chancellor with forty of the guard, came into the garden, with purpose to have apprehended and carried the Queene to the Tower; whose malepert approach the King greatly misliked, and sternely beholding him, stept a side, saluting him with the names of knave, foole, and beast, bidding avaunt out of presence. The Queene seeing the King chafed, but knew not the cause, indeavoured by all meanes to pacifie his Majestie, and intreated for the Lord Chancellour, whose fault as she thought and alledged was rather through misimprision then will, and therefore, said she, I will become an humble suiter for him unto your Highnesse. Ah poore Soule (quoth the King) thou little knowest Kate how evill he deserveth this grace at thy hands: of my word (sweet heart) he hath beene towards thee a very knave. But in following this tract of bloud, flowed from the fountaine of the fixe Articles, we have stepped over some other occurrences that happened somewhat before this time, unto which with thy patience, good Reader, we will returne againe.

The Lord Chancellors purpose to apprehend the Queene.

Hen. 8 assumeth the name of King of Ireland. An act. confirmed by Parl. 35. Hen. 8. John Lisley.

(114) King Henry by order of Parliament having assumed the Stile and Title of King of Ireland, with the submission of most of the Irish Nobility, James his Nephew, King of Scotland, tooke it not well, for that, as Lisley saith, a great part of Ireland, especially in the North, had beene in possession of the Scottishmen for many hundred of yeares before. These discontents conceived, King Henry well perceived; and because he would have no ill-will so neere him, that had so many enviers abroad, he sent unto King James that it would please him to repaire unto the City of Yorke, where he would meete him, to conferre for the wealth of both the Realmes, unto which at first he granted, but upon better advise, unaccomplished, his Counsellors moving the dangers; and his Clergy the feares; lest their Religion

Religion ſhould be changed to the offence of his confederates the Pope,the Emperour,and the French King.

(115) The unkindneſſe growing from this ſmall ſparke, was preſently kindled into great flames, for Commiſſioners being ſent from both Kings, to view the limits of either Kingdome, they fell at ods about a ſmall peece of ground,and from that tooke occaſion of emulations, and warres: to proſecute which, King Henry prepared an army, and ſent them into Scotland under the conduct of the Duke of Norfolke, accompanied with the Earles of Shrewsbury, Darby, Cumberland, Surrey, Hertford, Angus, and Rutland. Theſe, paſſing the Engliſh Marches, did much hurt in the kingdome of Scotland. To withſtand whom, King Iames gathered a power of five and thirty thouſand ſtrong,and at Fallow moore,meant to have bidden the Duke battell, which (as that Writer related) was not then minded to doe, but made againe into England, and paſſing the water Tweed, ſuſtained great loſſe by the couragious purſuit of the L. Hunly. King Iames upon a luſty courage,meaning to repaire the Scots loſſes with the Engliſh ſpoyles,was very forward to follow the Duke into their borders,but the Scottiſh Nobility wiſely waying the danger of war,by no meanes would either aſſent to aſſiſt him out of his owne kingdome, affirming it honour ſufficient, to have forced the Engliſh backe with no little loſſe.

(116) King Iames diſcontented at his Nobles denials,made towards the borders himſelfe, where,moving the Lord Maxewell Lord Warden of the Weſt Borders, with many other men of ſpeciall favour and account, to invade England, they gave their conſents. Theſe, paſſing the River Eske, did ſome ſmall damage upon the Weſterne Borderers, whereof Thomas Baſtard Dacres, and * Iacke of Muſgrave, as Holinſhead cals them, ſent word to Thomas Wharton, Lord Warden for the King upon the Weſt-Marches: But the Scots coming forward, they were forced to prepare for fight before the Lord Wharton could come, and out of their ſmall company left a ſtand upon the ſide of a hill.

(117) The Scots advanced forward with no little hope, were preſently danred with the ſight of theſe men, and verily thought that the Lord Wharton had aſſembled his Charge, or that the Duke of Norfolke, with a great army was come to their reſcue; whereupon they began to conſult what was beſt to be done; and demanding who was deputed Lieutenant by the King, Oliver Sinclere, of no great parts, nor honourable parentage, being lifted up upon the ſhoulders of two ſouldiers, ſhewed forth the Kings Commiſſion, wherein himſelfe was appointed their Generall, and whereat how ſoever it was written or read, the Lords tooke no little diſdaine that ſo many more worthy, honourable, and approved Captaines of the Field, ſhould be lead by this his Minion, but no Servant of Mars. In whoſe contempt,and for the indiſcretion of their King, they ſuffered themſelves to be taken Priſoners,and willingly loſt the day.

(118) This victory was won upon the twenty fourth of November, at a place beyond Carliel, called Solemmoſſe, where were taken Priſoners the Earles of Caſſils and Glencarne,the Lords Maxwel, Flemming, Summerwell, Oliphant, and Grey, Sir Oliver Sinclere,and others,to the number of one& twenty men of account, who were conveied to London, and committed to the Tower. For griefe of which loſſe,and ſuſpition of his Nobility, King Iames fell into a melancholy Paſſion, which the birth of his new-borne Princeſſe rather increaſed, then gave him any comfort, ſo as he deceaſed the foureteenth dayof December following,fore-ſhewing(ſaith Leſly)great troubles to follow in Scotland.

(119) Newes brought neere at one inſtant, of the death of King Iames, and birth of the Princeſſe his Daughter, King Henrie intended to doe that by the match of a marriage, which long had beene aſſayed by the Sword of Mars: all things ſo conforting as it did,he having one onely ſonne,then above five yeares of age, and Scotland no heire beſide this new-borne daughter; their yeares ſuiting a conſent for marriage, the whole Iland offering both the ioynter and dowry,and that which moſt moved their chiefe Nobility in his owne hands, to be moulded for this deſigne, as if heaven it ſelfe had bid the banes.

(120) Thoſe Priſoners therefore which had remained in the Tower onely two daies, upon the twenty-one of December,he ſent for to Weſtminſter,the Earls and Lords all ſuited in gownes of blacked damaske,furred with Cunny,where, after ſome words of friendly reproſe, they were beſtowed among the Engliſh Nobility, who uſed them according to their eſtates: and the third day,in Chriſtmas, were invited to the Court at Greenewich,where they went before the King to his Chappell, were royally feaſted, and the motion then made for the eſtabliſhing of peace,by the conjunction of the two Princes, whereunto the Scottiſh were as willing as the Engliſh, and proffered all forward aſſiſtance to have it accompliſhed. So that theſe Nobles were delivered without other ranſome, and richly rewarded at their departure from Court.

(121) Theſe returned into Scotland,declared what they had done, and ſo effectually followed the buſineſſe, that in a Parliament aſſembled of the three Eſtates,the marriage was confirmed, and a peace proclaimed to continue betwixt the two realmes the ſpace of ten yeares, which agreements were ſent into England by honourable Ambaſſadours, and there interchangeably ſealed betwixt theſe Potent Eſtates. But Cardinall Beton Archbiſhop of Saint Andrewes, fearing leaſt Scotland would change the Church Orders, as England had done (the Bible already read in their owne language, and the Popes uſurped power called in Queſtion, as then it began to be, by the fervent preaching of Frier Gutlam, to the great liking of moſt of the Lords) made ſome exceptions againſt the Earle Arraine the new-choſen Governour, being neereſt in bloud to the young Queene. And the French King not liking this union with England,fought by all meanes to breake the ſame match: to effect which, he ſent the Earle of Lennox to perſwade with the Governor,with great proffers and promiſes of aſſiſtance, but finding him faithful unto King Henry,preſently made faction for the French, wherein he drew the Queene-Mother, the Earles Huntly, Argile, Montroſſe, Menteith, and many more Peeres, the Cardinall amongſt them ever the chiefe.

(122) Earle Lennox thus growne into credit with the Queen-Mother,and made ſtrong by her adherents that favoured the French,preſently claimed to be Governor of Scotland,being the ſecond perſon of degree in the Realme,and withall to have the cuſtody of the young Queene,who with her mother were forthwith taken from Linlithqw under the charge of the Governour Arraine, and brought unto Striveling, ſtrongly guarded with the continuall preſence of the Lords, Levinſton, Erskwin, Flemming, and Ruthwen, leaſt Queene Mary ſhould be conveyed into England unto King Henrie. Theſe violent courſes, cauſed great Emulations among the Scottiſh Nobility, each of them ſiding as their affections were ſetled, but laſtly agree to ſet the Crowne on their young Queenes head: and prepared for the ſolemnity, whereunto all the Lords came, (excepting thoſe that ſtood for England,) and by them the Governour with much adoe was drawne to be preſent at the Coronation: but that accompliſhed, and the State affaires conſulted upon, it was agreed that the French Kings ſuite ſhould be favoured,and that the Earle Arraine ſhould be Governour ſtill, whereat Earle Lennox conceived ſuch diſpleaſure, as he became wholly for King Henrie, and joyned himſelfe with the Earles of Angus, Glencarne, and Caſſils, the Lords Maxwell, Summerwell, Gray, and others, that ſtood with the Engliſh for the match with Prince Edward.

(123) King Henrie then hearing what was done, and intended; ſent preſently into Scotland, to demand the Cuſtody of the young Queene, and that certaine Scottiſh Noble-men might be appoynted to guard her in England, untill ſhe came to yeares of conſent, according to Covenants formerly concluded; which no no wayes would be granted, and thereupon he prepared an army thitherward, under the conduct of Lord Edward Seimor Earle of Hertford,Lieutenant-General by Land, accompanied with the Earle of Shrewsbury, and a Fleeteof two hundred ſaile by Sea, whereof Sir Iohn Dudley, Vicount Liſle, was Admirall.

(124) To the ayde of the Scots, the Popes Holineſſe was very forward, who ſent them the Patriarch of Venice as his Legate, and Orator, to perſwade their Reſolutions; with whom the French King ſent Monſieur la Broche, and Monſieur Menager, to lead them to fight,and fifty thouſand Crownes of the Sunne,to ſuſtaine the Charge; with munition worth ten thouſand Crownes more. It ſeemeth by Leſly that part of this ſilver fell into the Earle Lennox his hand,and that therewith he made head againſt the Governor,but not able to match him,ſent unto King Henry for aide,with proffer of his ſervice againſt the French ſide,which ſo well was accepted of Henry, as he made him his Nephew,by giving the Lady Margaret his ſiſters daughter to be his Wife.

(125) The Engliſh thus ſeconded with this unlooked-for alliance, Cardinall Beton thought good to bind all to the Governour,who with the authority of the Queene Dowager, proclaymed Lennox an Enemy to the State. But in the meane-while the Admirall of England was entred the Frith, and at New-Haven landed his men, where joyning his, to the Land-Service,they all together marched thence toward Lieth, himſelfe leading the Vaward, Shrewsbury the Rereward, and the Lord Lieutenant the maine Battell. Theſe comming to Lieth, ſpoyled the Towne, and thence to Edenbrough,burnt the City,and waſted the Country for ſeaven miles about; this done, they ſet fire upon Haddington, and Dunbarre, and then the whole Army returned unto Barwicke.

(126) Whilſt things thus paſſed in Scotland, and the maine purpoſe reſting in ſuſpence, King Henry well knew where the greateſt rub did lie in his way, which was the French King, the chiefeſt Abettor of the Scots, whom he ever upheld,to hold him tacke at home, leſt otherwiſe he ſhould tugge with France for his owne right. And therefore having joyned with the Emperor againſt the French,ſent his Herald, Garter, King at Armes, to demand certaine covenants, which if he refuſed, to proclaime defiance unto open warres, but he not ſuffered to doe his meſſage to the King, returned, and Henry prepared an expedition into France,wherein he imployed the Dukes of Norfolke and Suffolke, the Earles of Arundell, Oxford, and Surrey, the Lords, Ruſſell, Grey, Fervers, Mountjoy, and Sainct-Iohn,beſides many other ſerviceable Knights, and Sir Iohn Dudley appointed high Admirall for the Seas. Of theſe ſome joyned with the Emperials, and ſhewed their value in the ſiege of Mastreil.

(127) The Duke of Suffolke in the meane while ſtrucke downe his Standards on the Eaſt ſide of Boloigne, and with many ſharpe skirmiſhes, entred the baſe-Towne,which ſiege King Henry himſelfe in perſon ſeconded, who having paſſed the Seas from England, upon the ſixe and twentieth of Iuly, encamped before Bolloigne on the Eaſt-ſide, whence his Canons ſo rent the Wals and Bulwarke,as their mounted tops lay upon the Ground, and his great morter-peeces were diſcharged with ſo skilfull a compaſſe,that their bullets falling downe-right, beat all buildings downe upon the Enemies heads. Whereby (ſaith Sleidane) in ſhort time he got that, which neither his Father, nor the Kings in former times could never win. For thereupon the Towne was ſurrendred and cleared of the French ſouldiers,women,and children.

(128) The King like a Conquerour with his ſword borne before him entred the Gate,where the Duke of Suffolke preſented him with the keyes of the Towne, the Trumpets ſtil ſounding,and nothing wanting that might applaud his fame. The town thuswon,the Engliſh meant ſtill to keepe; for the ſtrengthening whereof, the King commanded the faire Church of S. Maries to be taken downe,and in the ſame place,a mount to be raiſed for the planting of Ordnance, to annoy any ſiege. But being thus buſied in Bolloignes affaires, the Emperour, without his knowledge or conſent came to a peace with the French King, whereat King Henry was ſore diſpleaſed,and the ſooner left France, leaving Sir Iohn Dudley Lord Liſle, his deputy in Bolloigne,and landed at Dover the firſt day of October, to his great honour,and joy of his Subjects.

(129) The French King chafed with this late and great loſſe,fought to try fortune in further attempts, and that not onely for the recovery of Bolloigne, (which with twenty-thouſand well appointed he alſayed) but alſo in aſſayling the Engliſh dominions, as the Ile of Wight, and thoſe parts of Suſſex that lay upon the Seas,though with loſſe of many Captaines and thouſands of Souldiers,that never returned to tell him what intertainement they had; as likewiſe in ſending ayde unto Scotland, where Monſieur Mungumry of the Order of France, with 5000. ſtrong, entred to maintaine the breach betwixt them and King Henry, which was ſo followed on both parts, as the Engliſh making a Roade towards Gedworth, got praiſe for their valour, but reproach for thier ſpoyles, and the Scots renowne for killing the Lord Eure, Lord Warden of the Eaſt-Marches, with many other Captaines in defence of their Countrey.

(130) Hereupon an Army of twelve thouſand ſtrong was ſent into Scotland, whereof the Earle of Hertford was Generall: with theſe hee forraged the Borders before him, and burnt many Townes in the Middle-Marches, with Kelſey and Coldingham-Abbey,the French not haſty to ſtay the incurſion,lay ſtil, and let them (unfought with) depart for England.

(131) But the warres removed againe into France, the Reingrave with a great power came to victuall a Fort built neere unto Bolloigne; to impeach which, the Earle of Surrey, then Lieutenant of the Towne, made forth,but was diſcomfited in the enterprize,and Sir Edward Poynings, Captaine of a Band, ſlaine,with fifteene other Captaines, beſides many Officers and common Souldiers. Theſe Princes wars in theſa violent proceedings,became very feareful leſt they would grow to the common hurt of Chriſtendome, and therefore many other Potentates, whereof the Emperour was firſt, ſollicited theſe Kings unto a peace, which the ſooner was heard and imbraced, for that they were both of them olde,and King Henry diſeaſed in body. Commiſſioners therefore appointed,certaine articles were agreed upon: the firſt thereof was, that the French King ſhould pay unto King Henry, eight hundred-thouſand Crownes in eight yeares ſpace, and then to re-enter upon Bolloigne, but in the meantime it to remaine under the Engliſh; to accompliſh which peace, Mounſieur Danehalt, high Admirall of France, was ſent into England; and Sir Thomas Cheynie, Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports,to be the Kings Agent at the Font, for the Baptiſme of the Dolphins new-borne Daughter.

(132) Notwithſtanding theſe complements, the ſight of Bolloigne was a great fore in the French-mens eyes, inſomuch that Monſieur Chatillon, Captaine of Mountplaiſier, began to make a new Baſtilion neere unto the Towne, even in the very mouth of the River,which the Lord Grey of Wilton perceiving, certified the King, what inconvenience would happen if that were made ſtrong, and the ſame diſcuſſed at the Councell-Table, it paſſed with one voyce that the Peace with France was not to be infringed, notwithſtanding this French attempt: to which end a prohibition was drawne, (whereunto King Henry alſo ſet his hand,) that no let ſhould be made againſt Chatillon in his Fort. Howbeit the King commaunded Sir Thomas Palmer (imployed in this buſineſſe) to bid the Lord Grey to impeach the new worke, and to ſtat ſo much as was raiſed thereof unto the Earth. This Commiſſion read, with the report of Commaund to the Contrary, the Counſell of State, thought it moſt meete to follow their inſtructions in writing, leaſt the words might either be miſ-delivered or miſtaken. But the Lord Grey, cauſing the meſſengers words to be writ, and ſubſcribed with all their hands that that were present at the report, suddainely and unlooked for, came to the Fort, and in foure houres space cast downe, what had beene in raising three moneths before, which when the King heard off, he asked his Councellors what they thought of this, that Chatillon-garden was cast downe: amongst whom one of them answered, the doer thereof was worthy to loose his head; I had rather (said the King) loose a dozen of such heads as thine is, then his that had done the deed, and immediately sent the Lord Grey his pardon, with many great thankes.

An. Dom. 1547. King Henry fifteenth.

(133) But now the date of his time almost run, and he preparing towards the way of all flesh, the great and faire Church of the Gray-Fryers London, lately suppressed by himselfe, he caused againe to be opened, and to be made a Parish-Church, giving the revenewes thereof unto the City of London towards the reliefe of their poore, whereunto he gave 500. Markes yerely of Lands for ever to maintaine Gods divine service, and the said Churches reparations, within whose wals we find this often written, This is Christs Church founded by King Henry the eight.

Iob. Stow in Survey London.

Dated the 30. of December, and 38. of his raigne.

(134) And his sicknesse increasing to the great danger of life, he prepared himselfe to make his Will, wherein how soever titles had beene unabled in Parliaments, he ordained his three children to succeed each after others, for want of other Issue. One thousand markes he commanded to be given to the poore, and to twelve poore Knights at Windsore each of them 12. pence a day for ever, every yeare a long Gowne of white cloth, the Garter imbroydered upon the breast, wherein was placed the Crosse of Saint George, and a Mantle of red-Cloth to be worne thereupon, ordaining for his Executors in the minority of Prince Edward, these here-under named.

King Henries death.

And in great penitency for his sinnes, dyed upon Thursday the twenty eight day of Ianuary, in the yeare of Christ Iesus 1546. when he had raigned thirty seaven yeare, nine moneths, and five dayes, and had lived fifty five yeres, five moneths, and five daies, whose body with great solemnity was buried at Windsore, under a most costly and stately Tombe, begun in Copper and guilt, but never finished, in the inclosures of whose Grates is curiously cast this Inscription. HENRICVS OCTAVVS REX ANGLIAE, FRANCIAE, DOMINVS HIBERNIAE, FIDEI DEFENSOR: With what cost and state this his monument was intended, is manifested by a Manuscript taken from the true modell thereof, which I received from that industrious Harald Master Nicholas Charles Lancaster, and for the great magnificence is worthy here to be inserted.

The manner of the Tombe to be made for the Kings Grace at Windsore.

First, the Pavement whereupon the Tombe shall stand, shall be of Orientall stone: That is to say, of Alabaster, Porphiry, Serpentines, and other stones of divers colours, as in the patterne is shewed.

Item, upon the same Pavement shall be two great steps under all the worke, of like Orientall stones.

Item, the Basement of the Pillars shall be of white marble, with Angels holding between them Crowns, or Garlands guilt, as more plainely sheweth in the Patterne.

Item, above the said Basement and Angels, shall be all the old Testament, that is to say, xiiij. Images in the xiiij. Casements of the same two Pillars of the Prophets, and all the Pillars which shall be xvi. shall be of stones Serpentine, Porphiry, and Alabaster, and other fine Orientall stones, of such colours as is shewed in the patterne, and the foot of every pillar, and also the head shall be of Brasse. And every Prophet shall have an Angell sit at his foot, with Scripture of the name of his Prophet, and above over the head of the same shall be the story of his Prophet: in every of which story shall be at least viij. or xi. figures.

Item, above all the same pillars shall be another Basement of white marble, with a partition being made of such fine Orientall stones as the pillars be, wherein shall be written such Scripture as please you.

Item, above the same Basement shall be the story of the new Testament, that is to wit, with the Images of the Apostles, the Evangelists, and the foure Doctors of the Church, and every Image shall have sitting at his foote a little childe, with a Scripture of the name of his Image, and a little Basket full of red and white Roses, which they shall shew to take in their hands, and cast them downe off the Tombe, and over the Pavement, and the Roses that they shall cast over the Tombe, shall be enamelled and guilt, and the Roses that they cast over the Pavements shall be of fine Orientall stones of white, and red.

Item, behinde all the same Images of the new Testament round about, shall be made in brasse, and guilt all the life of Iesus Christ from the nativity to his ascention, and it shall be so clearely and perfectly made, that the Mystery of Christs life to his ascention shall plainely appeare.

Item, above the said new Testament and Images thereof, and above the said life of Christ, shall be a Quire of xx. Angels standing upon a Basement of white Marble, with great Candlesticks in their hands having lights in them shewing to honor and reverence the same Tombe.

Item, all these foresaid figures, stories, and ornaments shall bee made to garnish and ornate the two pillars of the Church betweene which the Tombe shall be set.

Item, betweene the said two great pillars of the Church thus garnished, shall be a Basement of white Marble of the height of the Basement of the pillars, and therein the Epitaph of the King and Queene, with letters of gold, of such Scriptures as ye devise.

Item, upon the same Basement shall be made two Tombes of blacke-Touch, that is to say, on either side one, and upon the said Tombes of blacke-Touch shall be made the Image of the King and Queene on both sides, not as dead, but as persons sleeping, because to shew that famous Princes leaving behinde them great fame, their names never doe die, and shall lie in royall Apparels after the antique manner.

Item, over the right hand, over both the sides of the same Tombe shall be an Angell which shall hold the Kings Armes, with a great Candlesticke, having as it were light on it as a Lampe, and in like manner shall be an other Angell holding the Queenes Armes on the left hand with a like Candlesticke.

Item, on the right hand and left hand on both the sides over the said Images of the King and Queene, shall be two Angels, shewing to the people the bodies of the King and Queene, holding above their Heads veiles of God, and the Crownes of the King and Queene on their hands.

Item, betweene the said two Tombes of blacke Touch, and the said Angel over the King and Queene, shall stand an high Basement like a Sepulchre, and on the sides whereof shall be made the story of S. George, and over the height of the Basement shall be made an Image of the King on Horse-backe, lively in Armor like a King, after the antique manner, shewing in countenance and looking on the said two Images lying on the said Tombes.

Item, on the right hand and left hand of the said two Tombes shall be foure Pillers of the foresaid Orientall stones, that is to say, on either side two Pillers, and upon every Piller shall be a like Basement of white Marble with partitions for Scriptures as shall be above the other Pillers. And on the same foure Basements of the said Pillers shall be made foure Images, two of Saint Iohn Baptist, and two of St. George, with foure little Children by them, casting roses, as is aforesaid.

Item, on the foure corners of the said Casement shall be made the Images of the foure Cardinall vertues, having such Candlesticks in their hands as is above said.

Item, on the top of the higheſt step of the said five steps, on the one side, shall be an Image of the Father, having in his left hand the Soule of the King, and blessing with his right hand, with two Angels holding abroad the Mantle of the Father on either side.

Item, the foure Images of St. Iohn Baptist and Saint George, and all the figures of the Father and Angels on the V. steps shall be V. foot.

Item, there shall be a Cxxxiiij. figures, Xliij. Stories, and all of Brasse guilt, as in the patterne appeareth.

(135) But, Sic transit gloria mundi; For how soever this Kings fame was thus intended, yet that great worke never came to perfection; but standeth as a Monument, how Kings, as other mortals are but dust and ashes, when the breath of life in them is dissolved, as the wiſeſt of Kings hath left upon record in Eccleſiaſtes the ninth. This magnificent Monarch was of presence Majesticall, and of Personage more then ordinarily tall, faire of Complexion and corpulent of body, very wife, and very well learned, of a sudden and ready speech, in youth very prodigall, and in his age very liberall, pleasant, and affable, but not to be dallied with, bold in attempting, and ever thirstie of potent glory: an expert Souldier, and favouring such as were active or serviceable, according to the then usuall saying, King Henry loves a man: and indeed somewhat too well the delights with women, as by his many wives here ensuing may well appeare.

His Wives.

(136) Katherine the first wife to King Henry, was the daughter of Ferdinando the sixt King of Spaine, and widdow-dowager of Prince Arthur his elder brother, as hath bin said: she was married unto this King the third of Iune: and first of his Raigne, the yeere of Salvation 1509. being solemnely crowned with him upon the twenty-fourth day of the same, and was his wife above twenty yeares, and then divorced from him by the sentence of the Archbishop of Canterbury; lived three yeares after by the name of Katherine Dowager. She deceased at Kimbalton in the County of Huntington the eight of Ianuary, and yeare of Christ 1535. and lyeth interred on the North-side of the quire in the Cathedrall Church of Peterborow, under a hearse of Blacke Saye, having a white Crosse in the middeſt. An. Dom. 1533.

(137) Anne, the second wife of King Henry, was the second daughter of Sir Thomas Bullen, Earle of Wiltshire and Ormond. She was solemnely at Windsor created Marchioneſſe of Pembroke, the first of September, and twenty foure of his Raigne, having one thousand pound given her by yeare, to maintaine her eſtate. She was married unto King Henry in his Closet at White-Hall, upon the twenty-fifth day of Ianuary, and yeare of christ Iesus 1533. being the foure and twentieth of his raigne, and was crowned with all due obſervances at Weſtminſter upon Whitſunday the first of Iune, where the Crowne of Saint Edward was set upon her head, the Scepter of Gold delivered into her right hand, and the Ivory-rod, with the Dove, into her left. She was his wife three yeares, three moneths, and twenty five daies, when being cut off by the sword the nineteenth of May, her body was buried in the Quire of the Chappell in the Tower, leaving her accused fame to be censured as affections beſt pleased the uncharitable minded, and her bed to be posseſt of a vertuous Lady. An. Dom. 1532.

(138) Iane, the third wife of King Henry, was the daughter of Iohn Seimer Knight, and sister to Lord Edward Seimer, Earle of Hertford, and Duke of Somerſet. She was married unto him the twentieth of May, even the next day after the beheading of Queene Anne, and the twenty eight of his Raigne. She was his wife one yeare, five moneths, and twenty foure dayes, and died in Child-bed the foureteenth of October, to the great griefe of the King, who not onely removed from the place, but kept himselfe private, and wore the Garment of mourning even in the Feſtivall time of Chriſtmas; her body was solemnely conveied to Windsore the eight of November following, where she was interred in the middeſt of the Quire of the Church within the Caſtle. An. Dom. 1536.

(139) Anne, the fourth wife of King Henry, and sister to William Duke of Cleve, was married unto him the sixth of Ianuary, in the thirty one yeare of his Raigne, the yeare of Grace 1540. she was his Wife An. Dom. 1540.

fixe moneths, after which time certaine Lords of the upper House of Parliament came into the nether, and alledged cause for which that marriage was unlawful, whereupon she was divorced, and by Statute enacted, that she should no more be taken for Queene, but should be called the Lady Anne of Cleve. She remained in England long after the Kings death, though small mention is made of her by any of our Writers, onely we finde that she accompanied the Lady Elizabeth through London at the solemnizing of Queene Maries Coronation.

(140) Katherine, the fifth Wife of King Henrie the eight, was the daughter of Edmund, and Neece unto Thomas Howard his brother, Duke of Norfolke: She was married unto him the eight of Auguſt, and yeare of Grace 1540. being the thirtie two of his Raigne, at Hampton-Court, and continued his Queene the ſpace of one yeare, ſixe moneths, and foure dayes, when for her unchaſt life, ſhe was attainted by Parliament, and for the ſame beheaded within the Tower of London the twelfth of February, and her body buried in the Chauncell of the Chappell by Queene Anne Bullen.

(141) Katherine, the ſixth and laſt wife of King Henry, was the daughter of Sir Thomas Parre of Kendall, and ſiſter to Lord William Parre Marqueſſe of Northampton: She was firſt married to John Nevill, Lord Latimer, and after his deceaſe, upon the twelfth of July married unto the King at Hampton-Court, the yeare of Salvation 1543. and thirty five of his raigne: She was his wife three yeares, ſixe moneths, and five dayes, and ſurviving him, was againe married unto Thomas Seimer Lord Admirall of England, unto whom ſhe bare a daughter, but died in the ſame Childbed, the yeare of Grace 1548.

His Iſſue.

(142) Henrie, the firſt ſonne of King Henrie by Queene Katherine his firſt Wife, was borne at Richmond in Surrey, upon the firſt of Ianuary, and the firſt of his fathers raigne, whoſe Godfathers at the Font were the Lord Archbiſhop of Canterbury Will. Warham, and the Earle of Surrey: his Godmother Lady Katherine, Counteſſe of Devonſhire, daughter to King Edward the fourth. This Prince lived not fully two moneths, but died in the ſame place wherein he was born, upon the two and twentieth of February, and his body with all due obſequies buried in Weſtminſter.

(143) A Son not named was borne unto King Henry by Lady Katherine, his firſt Queene, in the moneth of November, and the ſixth yeare of his raigne, who lived not long, and therfore no further mention of him can be made: the deaths of theſe Princes King Henry tooke as a puniſhment from God, for ſo he alledged it in the publike Court held in Blacke-Friers London, they being begot on his owne brothers wife.

(144) Marie, the third childe and firſt daughter of King Henrie by Queene Katherine his firſt wife, was borne at Greenewich in Kent, the eighteenth of February, in the yeare of Chriſts humanity 1518. and the eighth of his Raigne. She was, by the direction of her mother, brought up in her Child-hood by the Counteſſe of Salisbury her neere kinſwoman, for that as ſome thought, the Queene wiſhed a marriage betwixt ſome of her ſonnes and the Princeſſe, to ſtrengthen her Title by that alliance into Torke, if the King ſhould die without iſſue Male. In her young yeares ſhe was ſued to be married with the Emperor, the King of Scots, and the Duke of Orleance in France, but all theſe fayling, and ſhee ſucceeding her Brother King Edward in the Crowne, at the age of thirtie ſixe yeares, marched with Philip King of Spaine, to the great diſlike of many, and ſmall content to her ſelfe, he being imployed for the moſt part beyond the Seas, for griefe whereof, and the loſſe of Callis, ſhe laſtly fell into a burning feaver that coſt her her life.

(145) Elizabeth, the ſecond Daughter of King Henry, and firſt Childe by Queene Anne his ſecond Wife, was borne at Greenwich, upon Sunday the ſeventh of September, the yeare of Chriſt Ieſus 1533. and twentie five of her Fathers Raigne, who with due ſolemnities was baptized the Wedneſday following, Archbiſhop Cranmar, the old Dutcheſſe of Norfolke, and the old Marchioneſſe of Dorſet being the witneſſes at the Font, and the Marchioneſſe of Exceſter at the confirmation: Shee ſucceeded her ſiſter Queene Mary in the Monarchy of England, and was for wiſedome, vertue, piety, and juſtice, not onely the Mirrour of her Sexe, but a patterne for Government to all the Princes in Chriſtendome: whoſe name I may not mention without all dutiful remembrance, and whoſe memory unto me is moſt deare, amongſt the many thouſands that received extraordinary favours at her gracious and moſt liberall hand.

(146) Another man-childe Queene Anne bare unto King Henry, though without life, upon the nine and twentieth of Ianuary, and twenty ſeven of his raigne, to the no little griefe of the mother, and ſome diſlike of the King, as the ſequell of her accuſation and death did ſhortly confirme.

(147) Edward, the laſt child of King Henry, and firſt of Queen Iane, his third wife, was borne at Hampton-Court, the twelfth of October, the yeare of Grace 1537. and twenty nine of the Kings Raigne, being cut out of his mothers wombe as is conſtantly affirmed, like as Iulius Cæſar is ſaid to have beene: his Godfathers at the Font, was Thomas Cranmar Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Duke of Norfolke, his ſiſter Lady Mary being Godmother, ſaith Grafton: Sixe dayes after his birth he was created Prince of Wales, and at the death of his Father, ſucceeded him in all his dominions, of whom more followeth hereafter.

His Naturall Iſſue.

(148) Henry Fitz-Roy, the naturall ſonne of King Henry the eight, was begotten of the Lady Talboiſe, called Elizabeth Blunt, and borne in the Mannor of Blackamoore in Eſſex, about the tenth yeare of his Raigne; at the age of ſixe yeares he was created Earle of Nottingham, and in the five and twentieth of his Fathers raigne, upon the eighteenth of Iune, in the Kings Pallace of Bridewell, was made Duke of Richmond and Sommerſet, Lord Warden of the Eaſt, Weſt, and Middle-Marches againſt Scotland, and Lieutenant-Generall of all the parts of England Northward, he was a Prince very forward in Martiall Activities, of good literature and knowledge in the tongues, unto whom the learned Antiquary Leland dedicated a Booke; He married Mary daughter of Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolke, Earle Marſhall and Lord high Treaſurer of England, with whom he lived not long, but dyed at Saint Iames by Weſtminſter, the two and twentieth of Iuly, in the yeare of Chriſt Ieſus 1536. and was buried at Framingham in Suffolke.

THe tempeſtuous ſtormes in the Raigne of this King Henry the eight, and the violent deluge rayſed againſt the Church-ſtate of his times; have downe ſo many religious ſtrong foundations, and were the deſtruction of ſo many beautifull Monaſteries, as the onely relation of their numbers and names, would have much interrupted the narration of his Hiſtory. Wherefore to retaine their memorials, (though their walls are laid waſte) aſwell for the reverence we owe unto venerable Antiquity, as for the example of their Founders holy zeale, we have inſerted a Catalogue of their names, orders, and true valuations, as in the originall Booke thereof taken by Commiſſion, and given unto the King, we finde them ſet downe, though at their diſſolutions their values were favourably and farre under-rated. Some Founders, and times of foundations we want; the reſt, Table-wiſe, (to avoid prolixity) we have ſet downe in this preſent following Chapter.

A CATALOGVE OF THE RELIGIOVS HOVSES WITHIN THE REALME OF ENGLAND and VVales, with their Orders, Founders, Benefactors, and Values, moſt of them being ſuppreſſed by King Henry the eight. Together with ſuch other ſacred places, as either then were by him left ſtanding, or ſince have beene erected.

THE DIVINITY SCHOOLE AND LIBERARIE.

THE Divinity Schoole and Liberrary, a most Magnificent and Stately building, was founded in the raigne of King Edward the fourth, as appeareth by his Armes and Supporters, viz. a Greyhound and a Bull, graven in ſtone on the top of the vaults, in every partition in the nether Roome, now ſerving for the Divinity Schoole. The worke was done at the coſt and charges of divers perſons Spirituall and Temporall: And as it ſhould ſeeme by the Armes of moſt of them, both cut in Stone in the roofe of the Vault, as alſo in the Windowes, there was an intention and generall contribution for this worke, long before it was begun, for that many of thoſe Benefactors whoſe Armes are there ſet up, were dead long before the Fabricke was taken in hand. It was well furniſhed with Bookes, Richard Angervil dyed long before this Liberary was built, and therefore is not to be named as a Benefactor. Humphrey Duke of Gloceſter, who gave 129 choice Bookes, all of them Manuſcripts, which hee procured out of Italy. It continued in good eſtate untill the wavering and uncertaine time of King Edward the ſixt, when ſome ill diſpoſed, out of their private avarice envying the Common good, deſtroyed the Liberary, converting thoſe Bookes to their owne private uſe. But lately, in the raigne of our Soveraigne King Iames, this wrong and ſacriledge hath beene ſupplyed by that worthy Mæcenas and Ptolomey of our times, Sir Thomas Bodley Knight, who hath beſtowed many thouſand pounds, not onely in getting the choyſeſt Authors and Bookes in all Chriſtendome, and from the remoteſt parts in the World; but alſo in making Anno 1611. a new Croſſe-building anſwerable to the magnificy of the former worke, finiſhed Anno 1613. and a faire new Gallery over the building of the Schooles. So that now it is one of the chiefeſt Liberaries in the World, for uſe, ſtore of Bookes, and magnificence.

Since in this Precedent Table, wee have laid to the Readers view a great part of this Kings ill, the waſte of ſo much of Gods revenue (howſoever abuſed) let him not hold it in curioſity, out of ſeaſon, ſince it may in Charity fall well in ſequence by ſetting downe the Churches either erected, or reſtored by him, or by him (which is the now ſtate of our Clergie) continued, to redeeme his memory, blemiſhed by the former errour from the vulgar aſperſion of ſacrilegious impiety.

This King after the diſſolution of the Religious Houſes, erected theſe ſixe Biſhopricks, to wit, Weſtminſter, Cheſter, Peterborough, Oxford, Briſtoll, and Glouceſter, whereof the five laſt are in eſſe, and at the ſame time he erected alſo theſe Cathedrall Churches hereafter mentioned, wherein he founded a Deane, and the number of Prebends following, viz.

EDVVARD

Edw. VI.

EDVVARD THE SIXT OF THAT NAME, KING OF ENGLAND, FRANCE, AND IRELAND, DEFENDER OF THE FAITH, &c. THE FIFTIE-NINTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISH, HIS LIFE, ACTS, AND DEATH.

Monarch 59.

Chapter XXII.

An. Dom. 1547.

EDWARD the ſixth of that Name, and onely ſonne living unto King Henry the eight, was borne at his Manor of Hampton-Court in Middleſex, the twelfth of October, and yeare of ſalvation, 1537. and ſixe dayes after being the eighteenth of the ſame moneth, hee was created Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earle of Cheſter: his birth was joyfull unto the King and Commons; but the death of his Mother, the vertuous Queene Iane, brought immediate ſorrow unto both, whoſe wombe was cut (as ſome have affirmed) to the ſaving of his, but loſſe of her owne life, upon whoſe death theſe elegant verſes were writ;

Phœnix Iana jacet nato Phœnice, dolendum
Sæcula Phœnices nulla taliſſe duas.

Here lies the Phenix, Lady Iane, whoſe death a Phenix bare,
O griefe, two Phenixs at one time, together never were.

P. Gratian.

Alluding to the Creſt of her Father a Phœnix in flames within a Crowne.

(2) Nine yeares and odde moneths he was vertuouſly trained up in the life of his Father, and at his death appointed the firſt of his heires, and for want of iſſue (if it ſo chanced) Mary, and thee failing, Elizabeth to ſucceed in his Throne: for as Henry with Salomon was blame-worthy for women, ſo left he but one ſonne and two daughters, as the other in Scripture is ſaid to have done: Salomon had Rehoboam a foole, and unfortunate, his daughters, but obſcure, and both of them Subjects; but Henry was more happy in Edward his sonne, who proved another young Salomon himselfe, and his sisters both Soveraignes of an Imperiall Crowne.

(3) He began his raigne the twentie eight of January, in the yeare of Christ Iesus 1546. and the last of that moneth was proclaimed King of England, France and Ireland, Defender of the Faith; and supreme Governour of these Churches, with other his rightfull Titles to his Imperiall Stiles belonging. And on the twentieth of February following, being Shrove-Sunday, was Crowned at Westminster with all due Solemnities.

John Stow.

The Duke of Hereford made Protector by Parliament.

(4) His Counsellours were appointed by his licke Father as we have said, and Protector over his Minority and Realmes (by consent of the Nobles) was ordained his Vncle Edward Lord Seymer, Earle of Hereford and Duke of Sommerset, brother unto Queene Iane, who thereupon gave the young King immediately did the like unto the Lord Mayor of London.

2 Chron 34.

(5) His first businesse was to establish Gods service, who had established him in the Throne, and as another Iosiah in godly zeale, destroyed Idolatry, by pulling downe Images in England, as that King in Iudah did the Altars of Baalim; sought the Salvation of his Subjects, by sending forth Preachers to instruct the people, as Iosiah did the Levites, the teachers of Israel unto their charges: brought the Bible in a knowne language to be read in the Church, as he did the Arke into the Temple of the Lord; commanded the ancient and true use of the Sacrament in both kinds, as Iosiah commanded the Passeover both to be kild and celebrated in Ierusalem, and in all things proved another Iosiah indeed.

Iosiah and King Edward compared. 2 chron. 35.

Statutes 1 Ed. 6. An. 1.

(6) And as Edward was busied in setting forth Gods glory, so the Protector and Councell were carefull for the State of the Realme, and especially for their Kings marriage with Mary the young Queene of Scotland, unto which a Parliament at Edenburgh had consented in Anno 1543. and for confirmation thereof, had sent into England, William Earle of Glancarn, Sir George Dowglas, Sir William Hamilton, and Sir Iames Lermound, Scotish Knights, Ambassadors, unto King Henry deceased, betwixt whom the contracts were sealed interchangeably as we have said.

(7) And now by the Councell of England was thought most fit to be sought after, and consummated, for the wealth and peace of the whole Iland: wherefore they published their desires to that end, in an Epistle sent to the Scotish Nobility, directed unto them by the Lord Protector; wherein they were remembred of the many incursions, roades, and spoiles, committed and done, upon either Kingdome through their continuall hostilities, and warres: shewing likewise the neerenesse of language, lineaments, and conditions of the Nations; inhabiting the same Iland, and therefore a most sure token (as they tooke it) to be descended from one and the same Originall; urging Gods providence, that had taken away all the Male-Princes of Scotland, leaving them only one daughter, and in England, onely one sonne unto King Henry among his many wives. Their Princes themselves for yeares, qualities, and magnificence, fitly ordained to contract the union of Peace: alleaging that England sought neither the preheminence, nor the conquest of Scotland, but rather desired an equality both in State and government; and to that end offered to take the name of Britaines, indifferent to both, though dishonourable to themselves, in bereaving their Nation of the glory atchieved, in many of their victories. These notwithstanding, the Scotish persisted, to bestow their young Queene another way.

The English desire the marriage with Scotland.

(8) Whereupon the Protector in person, undertooke an expedition into Scotland, accompanied with the Earle of Warwicke, the Lords Dacres, and Grey of Wilton, many Knights, and a most warlike army of Souldiers. Edward Lord Clinton, Admirall of the Fleete was appointed to Sea, and Sir William Woodhouse made his Vice-admirall: these meeting at Barwicke, set forth into Scotland, declaring by sound of Trumpet the cause of their comming, with proffers of peace to all such of that Nation, as would advance the marriage betwixt their two Princes, according to Covenants already concluded upon.

The Protector goeth into Scotland.

(9) The Governour of Scotland hearing newes of many Castles furrender and surprise, and feares daily encreasing by augmented reports, commanded his Heraulds with all possible diligence, to passe through all the parts of the Realme, and the Fire-Crosse to bee borne wheresoever they came; a Custome indeed anciently used in greatest extremitie, and onely then after this manner, two fire-Brands set a Crosse, were carried upon the point of a speare, with Proclamation of the eminent danger, calling for aide, assigning the time and place, when and whither they were to resort: yet there be that say, It was a painted red Crosse set up for certaine dayes in the Field of that Barony, whereunto the aide should come: and those that refused, being above sixteene, and under sixty were accounted traitors, and their Land confiscated to the King. This ancient muster the Governour commanded, appointing them a day to be at * Mussilburt, in defence of their liberties and young Princes life: which presently strucke such regard to their hearts, that thither they strove who should be first, and pitched their Standards even in the face of the Enemy.

The English made Proclamation in Scotland.

(10) Many warlike enterprises were attempted betwixt them, many prisoners taken, and stout Souldiers slaine, upon the Scots part the Lord Hume by a fall from his horse lost his life, and his sonne with one Maxwell and sixe other Gentlemen taken prisoners. Of the English were hurt Henry Vane, and Bartevill, a French-man: Bulmer, Gower, and Crouch, three Captaines of the light horsemen were taken prisoners: all which so happened before the day of great Battell.

Enterprises done before the great battell was fought.

(11) Whilest these things proceeded, and either part played upon the advantage, Earle Huntly of Scotland, sent a Herauld and Trumpet unto Englands Protector, with proffers of Combate, either twentie to twentie, ten to ten, or in single fight themselves man to man, which surely was honourable, the Scots having advantage for number, and charitable for the saving of Christian bloud: but their persons unequall in regard of his place; that demand was denied, and proffers made for the battell: which happened even the next day following, being the tenth of September, and the last of the weeke.

Earle Huntly his stout challenge.

(12) The place where the English lay encamped, was upon the Bankes of Edenbrough Frith, wherein their Ships floted to further the Land service, and their men seeking the advantage of a hill, called Pinkinclenche, hasted thitherward betimes in the morning; the Scotish thinking they had fled to their ships, made the like hast to impeach their March, their Army they divided into three Battels, the Vantgard whereof was led by the Earle of Angus, the reregard by the valiant Earle Huntley, and in the great Battell, was the Governour with the Earle of Argile, and many other of the Scotish Nobilitie.

(13) These eager of spoile, and filled with hope, hasted furiously forward, without all feare, or any good Order, and breathlesse, almost passed over the River Eske, preventing thereby the expectation of the enemy, but being within danger of shot, the English Fleete from the Road let freely flie among a wing of the Irish-Archers, slaying many, with such terrour to the rest, as hardly could they be gotten to goe forward, which indangered them more. The Scotish Armie thereupon removed somewhat South-ward, seeking to get the higher ground, with advantage both of Sunne and winde, the desire whereof caused them little to regard the helpe of Horse, but for hast drew their great Ordnance thitherward onely by maine strength of men.

English Captaines slaine, and the Lord Grey hurt.

The Kings Standard in danger to be lost.

The battell of Musselburgh.

(14) The English Captaines perceiving what the Scotish intended, and that now no skirmish but a Battell must be undergone, fell to Consultation, as they sate mounted in their saddles, where with such resolutions they departed asunder, that John Earle of Warwicke, Lord Marshall of the Field, desired the Protector to be good unto his Wife and Children, if on his part things went not well with him. By this time the Armies were at point to joyne battell, in the place called Edmondstone-edge, neere unto Muskelborough, where the Master of the English Ordnance had mounted two Canons neere unto the top of the hill. The Scotish came forward, faster then an ordinary March, their Pikemen thicke ranged together, bearing broad Bucklers in their left hands.

(15) At the first encounter Captaine Shelley Lieutenant of the Band of Bulleners: Captaine Ratliffe brother to the Lord Fitzwater, with many Gentlemen of name and account, were slaine, and the Lord Grey of Wilton Generall of the Horsemen, dangerously hurt in the mouth with a Pike: and indeed such was the fury of the Scots first encounter, that the English horsemen were forced backe, and in retiring ranne through, and bare downe a part of their owne foot-men, to their great hurt: when their Kings Standard (borne by Sir Andrew Flammoch) was laid fast hold on by the Scotish, and had not that Knights strength beene the more, and his Horse the better, himselfe had beene slaine, and the Standard lost, which notwithstanding was grasped so fast, that the Scots bare away the Nether end of the staffe to the burrell.

(16) The Canons from the hill, played fore upon the Scotish, and so did the Ordnance out of the English Fleete, whose terrible noise and smoake, filled the Armies with furious Cryes, and darkened the day as with the Clouds of night: The retreat of the Protectors Horsemen, disordering their fellowes (as is said) gave signes unto the Scots of a present victory, who now upon a forward Courage disranked themselves for hast, and fell upon the disbanded English, who presently by their Leaders were brought into Array, and fiercely prefsed forward upon the vantgard of the enemy, their advantage the more, for that the Scots wanted shot to answer their violence: which caused them in haste confusedly to retire towards their great Battell; and those misdeeming the day had beene loft, turned their backes and fled; the chase was followed almost five miles, wherein the Lord Fleming with sundry men of note were slaine: Bishop Leslie recordeth nine by name, besides ten thousand of their souldiers that therein lost their lives, and prisoners taken, about a thousand persons, the chiefe whereof was the Earle of Huntly, Chancellour of Scotland, the Lord Yester, Hobby, Hamilton, Captaine of Dunbarre, the Master of Saupoole, the Lord Wimmes, and a brother of the Earle of Cassils: such was the successe of the English, and losse of the Scottish.

(17) Lieth they sacked and set on fire, tooke the Iland Saint Colmes, Broughticrag, Rockesburgh, Humes Castle, and others: so that many Gentlemen in Tividall, and the Meres, came to the Protector, and entred into termes and conditions of Peace. In the meane while by the working of the Governour, and Queene Dowager, the young Queene was suddenly conveyed from Striveling, unto the Ile, and Abbey of Michmahomo, as to a place of more securitie, and shortly after into France to be married unto the Dolphine, shee then being of age betwixt five and sixe: whereat the English so stormed, as they determined and threatned the Conquest of Scotland. But God who is the disposer of Kingdomes, and hath the hearts of Princes in his owne hand, in his unsearchable decrees, saw it not time to unite us yet, the whole Iland under one Crowne, to which end he suffered the French to assist the Scots, and England to be burthened with her owne civill broyles.

(18) For the Protector returned, and a Parliament at London assembled, all Colledges, Free-chappels, and Chanteries, were given to the King, wherein was repealed the Statute formerly made, and commonly called the Sixe Articles, which had beene the cause of many Martyrs deathes, in the dayes of King Henry his Father, as also other enacted by King Richard the second, and Henry the fift, for the suppression of Scriptures in English, and other points held, in their dayes accounted hereticall, at which time also injunctions went forth to cleanse the Church of all Images, and Commissioners sent with authoritie to pull them downe, who first began at the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paules in London, and thence proceeded casting downe those Idols in all the Churches throughout England and Wales. Whereof great stirres prefently happened, and in Cornwall the first.

The act of the sixe articles repealed.

(19) For the Kings Commission being put in practise, and these gay golden Images cast downe, broken and burnt, their Priests accounted the Act sacrilegious, and one of them as Baals for zeale, sought to make his sacrifice with bloud, but sparing his owne, sheathed his knife in the heart of Master Body a Commissioner, imployed about the same businesse: which fact was so favoured among the rurall Commons of Cornwall, and Devonshire (who ever gave voice for the Papall continuance) that in a rebellious manner they combined together against the King.

Body murthered by a Priest for pulling downe Images.

(20) Their chiefe Captaines were Humfrey Arundell, Governour of the Mount, with sixe other Gentlemen of name, neither were the Priests backeward in so bad a worke, whereof Robert Bocham, and seven others were the forwardest men; accompanied with no lesse then ten thousand tall Souldiers, who all sought to undoe those points of Religion, which the King by law and Act of Parliament had ordained to be observed: Whereupon they besieged the Citie of Excester, and with many sharpe assaults fought the possession thereof, twise firing the Gates, and leaving nothing undone, that either wit or warre would afford to obtaine: for they brought the Citizens to such distresse, that they forced them to mould up branne for their bread, working it in Cloathes, for otherwise could they not bring it to incorporate together: their daintiest flesh was their owne horses, and those slaine were distributed aswell to the poore as rich; for which their loyaltie and most faithfull service King Edward did both highly esteeme them, and richly reward them by confirmation of the Cities Charters, inlarging the liberties, augmenting the revenewes, and giving unto the Citizens the Mannor of Exiland, as the signet of his love for their service to the Crowne, to be had in remembrance of their loyaltie for ever. Meane while the Rebels robbed the Countrey, unto whom all things was common that came unto hand.

Commotion in Cornwall.

Excester in great distresse by the rebels.

(21) The Rebels thus pestering those parts with their riotous attempts, looked and well hoped that others would have joyned to their aide, but therein deceived, they lastly fell to Consultation what was to be done, and in fine concluded for the best policy to article with the King, which how to be set downe, bred likewise much trouble and disturbance with their confused cries: for these rude and unexperienced Councellors made their owne conceived opinions the fundamentall matters for redresse, some would have this, and other some that; but none would be gainesaid of his will or demand, holding his voice as worthy of hearing in this Court of assembly, as his body an aide to support the Action, so that long it was ere they could light on their owne discontents, and longer ere they could agree what they would have reformed, onely still constant in variable unconstancy; for some would have no Iustices, others no Gentlemen, Parkes must be Pastures, and Inclosures must downe, the Priests ever pulling the Bell-rope to ring the Masse into England, and to vowll Cardinall Poole from Rome, and with much much adoe, lastly to little purpose Articles were agreed upon, and sent to the King, the Copy whereof was thus.

Articles of the Rebels Sacrament of Baptisme.

(22) Forasmuch as man, except hee be borne of Water and the holy Ghost, cannot enter into the Kingdome of GOD, and forasmuch as the gates of Heaven be not open without this blessed Sacrament of Baptisme, therefore we will that our Curates shall minister this Sacrament at all times of need, aswell in the weeke dayes, as on the holy dayes.

Confirmation.

Item, wee will have our children confirmed of the Bishops whensoever wee shall within the Diocesse resort unto them.

Consecration of the Lords Body.

Item, forasmuch as wee constantly beleeve that after the Priest hath spoken the words of Consecration being at Masse, there celebrating and consecrating the same, there is very really the Body and Bloud of our Saviour Iesus Christ, GOD and Man, and that no substance of Bread and Wine remaineth after, but the very same Body that was borne of the Virgin Mary, and was given upon the Crosse for our Redemption: therefore we will have Masse celebrated as it hath beene in times past, without any man communicating with the Priests, forasmuch as many rudely presuming unworthily to receive the same, put no difference betweene the Lords Body and other kinde of meate; some saying that it is bread before and after: some saying that it is profitable to no man except hee receive it, with many other abused termes.

Hallisbread.

Item, we will have in our Churches reservation.

Reservation of the Lords Body consecrated. Holy Bread & Holy Water.

Item, wee will have holy bread, and holy water in the remembrance of Christs precious Body and Bloud.

Priests not to be married.

Item, we will that our Priests shall sing and say with an audible voyce, Gods service in the Quier of the Parish Churches, and not Gods service to bee set forth like a Christ-masse play.

Item, forasmuch as Priests be men dedicated to GOD, for ministring and celebrating the blessed Sacrament, and preaching of Gods Word, wee will that they shall live chaste without marriage, as Saint Paul did, being the elect and chosen vessell of God: saying unto all honest Priests, Be ye followers of mee.

The five Articles.

Item, wee will that the five Articles which our Soveraigne Lord King Henry the eight set forth in his latter dayes, shall be used, and so taken as they were at that time.

The Kings answere and generall pardon.

Item, wee pray God save King Edward, for we be his, both body and goods.

(23) To these their Demands the King sent an answer, therein pittying their ignorance, and blaming their folly, and therewithall his Generall pardon, to as many as would desist whiles it was time. First he reproved them, for their presumptions, thus contumeliously to rise against their dread Soveraigne, to the disturbance of his loyall Subjects peace; whose simplicity they had notoriously abused, in using his name to draw them into action of Rebellion: and no lesse likewise in the grounds of their demands. As in the first Article for Baptisme, where it was well knowne the same was admitted as necessity required, or rather commanded by the Booke of Common Prayer, published by authoritie of Parliament, and as themselves knew in present practise. But touching the Sacrament in their second Article, how impudently they did belie the true receivers thereof, was manifest, who make so much difference in that holy administration, that they account no profit in Common bread, besides the nourishment of their naturall Bodies: but this blessed bread to be the food of their soules unto eternall life. And as you are seduced in these (saith the admonition) so in confirmation also they carry your simplicities captive, for the truth teacheth no otherwise then themselves beleeve, namely, that a Child baptized, and dying before confirmation, is nethelesse in state of Grace, else are themselves causers of their childrens damnation: so the service of God brought from an unknowne tongue, cannot surely offend any reasonable man, which is onely to make him understand that, which before he knew not, and to give his consent to those prayers, whereof he hath most need, and giveth the negrest touch to his owne feeling conscience, for God requireth the heart onely which with an understanding service, we must sacrifice unto him. But most of all (saith this good King) we marvell at your demand, for the five Articles restored, to have them in power as formerly hath beene. Doe you know what you aske, or in obtaining doe you know what you get? They were lawes indeed lately made, but quickly repented; too cruell for you, and too mercilesse for us; who would have our Raigne written with milke, and not with bloud, and because they were bloudy, we tooke them away, with the same authoritie, by which they were made; left retaining them, our Sword should be too often drawne, and rigour extended upon our true and well-deserving subjects. We for our parts seeke no longer to live, then to be a father unto our people, and as God hath made us your rightfull King, so hath he commanded you unto obedience: by whose great Majesty we sweare, you shall feele the power of the same God in our sword; which how mighty it is, no subject knoweth: how puissant it is, no private man can judge, and how mortall, no English heart can thinke: therefore embrace our mercy while it is offered, left the bloud spilt by your meanes cry vengeance from the Earth, and be heard in the eares of the Lord in Heaven.

Answer to the five Articles.

(24) All this notwithstanding, the Rebels persisted in their traiterous attempts: against whose seditions Sir Iohn Russell Lord Privy Seale, was appointed Generall of the Kings Army, unto whose assistance was joyned the Lord Grey of Wilton, under whom served a band of Italians intended against Scotland, these lay at Brisbow, attending the comming of the Lord Generall: who now was marched Westward to Honiton, where daily looking for more supply, those which he had, began to shrinke away, whereby the Rebels were emboldened to make towards him, and came as far as Fenington-bridge within three Miles of Honiton, and in a faire Meadow there spread their Colours. The Lord Russell, though weake in comparison of them, holding it more honour to assaile, then to be assaulted, made forward even unto the Bridge: at whose sight the Enemies prepared themselves to fight, and with a strong guard maintained the Bridge, besides which there was no passage over the River, that held his course betwixt the two Armies.

King Edwards lawes written in milke and not in bloud.

(25) Great were the attempts the Lord Lieutenant gave, and manfull was the resistance that the Rebell made, yet lastly the way was wonne, and followed unto the battell of the disloyals: where presently began a most cruell fight, and a while was maintained to the losse of their bloud, but the false hearts failing, and the true subjects courage increasing, the Cornish immediately gave backe and fled, whereat the Kings souldiers out of Order fell to the spoile, minding nothing lesse then that which presently ensued, for the Cornishmen perceiving their disordered carriage, suddenly returned, and began a new fight, when the Lord Russell likewise ordered a new his Army: these furiously joyning, a sharpe and cruell encounter ensued, with the losse of much bloud, and the lives of three hundred Rebels, who lastly tooke to their heeles, and left the field: the chase a while followed, and the Souldiers scattered, a fearefull cry suddenly arose, that all the Commons were up, which caused the Lord Generall to returne unto Honiton: whether shortly came the Lord Grey of Wilton, having in pay Spinola an Italian Captaine with three hundred shot.

Spoken like a King.

(26) The Lord Russels forces augmented, his greatest care was to releeve the City Excester, whither upon the third of August he hasted from Honiton being a thousand strong; and passing over the Downes toward Woodbury, lodged his Campe, that night neere to the Wind-Mill, whereof the Rebels having intelligence, raised themselves from Saint Mary

Mary Clift, and made amaine unto the Downes, thinking to surprise the Lord Generall before hee was ready; but hee as vigilant as they were forward, encountred them againe in battell, and againe gave them the overthrow with the losse of the most of their lives, the rest escaping by flight, got unto the Towne of Saint Mary Clift.

The Capraines of the Rebels executed.

(27) The newes whereof bruted, and the Papall side bruised by these three overthrowes, the Commons in whole troupes resorted to their ayde, and to make all sure on their side (by the presence and helpe of their consecrated God) they brought into the field the Crucifixe under a Canopy, which in stead of an Alter was set in a Cart, accompanyed with Crosses, and Candlesticks, Banners, Holy-Bread, and Holy-Water, both to drive away Divels, and to dull their enemies swords; which notwithstanding they did not, neither could they deliver themselves in the day of destruction; for the Towne being fired, and the Armies met upon Clift heath, a most cruell and bloudy battell was fought, wherein was slaine the whole rout of the Rebels, and all these trinkets cast in the durt.

The Major of Bodmin hanged.

(28) The chiefe Captaines were taken and sent unto London, who were Humphrey Arundell, Winsland, Holmes, and Bury, who there paid the Law with the losse of their lives. Many others were executed without judgement, onely by Marshall Law, as was Boier Major of Bodmin in Cornwall, unto whom Sir Anthony Kingston, Provost Marshall sent word he would visite him at dinner, but before hee was set downe, commanded the Major to cause a paire of Gallowes to be set up; and the table taken away, he willed the said Major to accompany him to the place, and there presently commanded Boier his Host to the halter, and saw him hanged before he departed.

Forces sent against the Rebels.

(29) At the same time, and neere the same place dwelled a Miller, who had beene a busie doer in the Rebellion, but hee knowing the danger, willed his man to take the name of the master, if any enquired after him; whereupon the said Sir Anthony came to the mill, and calling for the master, the man in his name presented himselfe, who strait commanded him unto the Gallowes, the servant then seeing the danger of death, confessed hee was not the master, but the man: well, said the Knight, thou canst never doe thy master better service then to hang for him, and thereupon trussed him up in the next tree.

(30) As these things were in acting in the West, so other commotions arose in other parts of the Land, though broched under another pretence, namely the laying open of inclosures, which the King by Proclamation had commanded to bee done, but many offenders bearing themselves out with greatnesse, slackened the execution, and the poorer presuming upon the Kings pleasure, began to execute his commission themselves, and those in many places at once, as in Kent, Essex, Sommerset, Buckingham, Northampton and Lincolneshires they did.

(31) But most dangerous was that in Norfolke, whose Inhabitants following the examples of the rest, held out much longer, and in more violent manner. Their first attempt was at Aslborough against one Greene that had taken away part of their commons, next at Wimonham, where by the instigation of John Flowerdew they cast downe the fences of Inclosures, belonging to Robert Ket a Tanner in the same Towne; who to bee even with Flowerdew brought them to Hetherset, and set them on worke to pull downe both hedge and ditch of his pasture grounds incloſed: to which worke hee gave such desperate incouragements, that these unrulies presently chose him for their Ringleader, who with them passed to Bowthrope, laying all levell where they came.

(32) Their number encreasing, and doings outragious, Sir Edmund Windam Knight, at that time high Shiriffe of the Shire, made proclamation among them in the Kings name to depart, which if they did not forthwith, hee pronounced them Traitors, but had not his Horse beene swifter, hee had beene either taken or slaine, thereupon their terrour began to be fearefull, and themselves to be furnished with weapons, Armour and Artillery, daily brought them in abundance by the By-dwellers, besides store of victuals to maintaine their campe.

Sir Edmund Windam in danger.

(33) But now considering what dangers were open, if dispersedly scattered they should attend their bad worke, they held it best policy to draw to one place: and to fortifie themselves together with further strength; whereupon with full resolution, Monshold was thought fittest neere unto Mount Surrey, a place built by these Earles of that County, and upon Saint Leonards hill which hangeth over Norwich, they unkennelled themselves; besides these of Monshold, a lesser rabble of them lay at Rising-chase neere Linne, which were rowsed thence by the Gentlemen of those parts: who first from Watton, then from Thetford, and next from Brandon, were forced to their litter at Monshold.

Monshold the place of the randevow.

(34) Their parts were rigorous, or rather inhumane even to their welwillers, for it is a knowne truth, that Sir, Roger Wodehouse in kinde courtesie bringing them two Carts laden with Beere, and another with victuals, was recompenced with the losse of all his Horses, his owne apparell, and his body tugged, and torne, cast into a ditch, whom lastly with others was imprisoned by them in the house of Mount Surrey, and yet would they seeme very Religious, having one Coniers for their Chaplaine, who devoutly said service unto them both morning and evening.

The inhumanities of the commotioners.

(35) To those, the lewdly disposed of Suffolke assembled, as also the scumme and dregs out of Norwich, adding still fewell to their owne smoaky flames by firing of Beacons, ringing of Bels, and what not, to set all in an uproare: some true and faithfull subjects they violently led away, and made them of their councell, namely Thomas Cod, Major of Norwich, Robert Watson Preacher, and Thomas Alderiche Gentleman, Sergeant Catlyn, and Sergeant Gaudy, whom they kept fettered, and compelled them to be attendant upon Ket; who now tooke upon him to bee the Kings Deputy, and to give out warrants in his Majesties name, by vertue of which, many of Worship and credit were fetched from their dwellings, brought before him, and violently cast into prison: their Rabble encreased to the number of sixteene thousand men.

Supplies of the Commotioners.

Many good subjects forced to attend upon the Rebels.

(36) And that the shew of Iustice and piety was onely the marke whereat these lawlesse levelled, they ordained a Tribunall seat in an old tree, whose Canopie was the Cope of Heaven: in this sate the Tanner as a Chauncellor or chiefe Iudge, accompanyed with his Councellors, assisted by two chosen men out of every hundred among them, hither assembled the complaints of the Campe, and hence had they commission to fetch out of Ships both Ordinance, powder and shot, and out of Gentlemens houses all abilements of warre: and heere such Raskals as had exceeded their commission, had judgement of imprisonment, so that this tree was termed, the Oake of Reformation, whence likewise sometimes Sermons were delivered to the people, and once by the Reverent Doctor Parker, which had almost cost him his life.

The tree of Reformation.

(37) To these the Kings generall Pardon was publikely pronounced by an Herald at Armes, but so farre off from embracing, as the Rebels from the height of the hill, shot at the City, which doing little harme, they removed their Ordinance to the lower ground, and thence began to batter the Wals, and without great resistance entred the Towne, where they became Masters of all the munitions, and emprisoned the Major, and many other Citizens.

fought to quiet, and to that end sent the L. William Parr, Marques of Northampton, with fifteene hundred Horsemen unto Norwich, accompanied with the Lords Sheffield, and Wentworth, besides many Knights; who at his first comming thither, summoned the Citie to yeeld; the Magistrates whereof as willingly obeyed, and repairing to his Standard, yeelded up their Cities Sword unto him; declaring themselves true subjects to the King, though some of the baser sort had favoured Kets doing, and with them immediately the Lord Marquesse entred the Citie, which the same night was assaulted by the Rebels, whom he manfully resisted, and slew three hundred of their riotous rout.

(39) The next day following these bloud-hounds unkennelled by troupes, and entring the City by the Hospitall, began a most cruell fight, wherein the Lord Sheffield by the fall of his horse into a ditch was cowardly slaine by a Butcher, as hee sought to recover himselfe, and the rebels now fleshed with this their fortunate chance, followed the chase with such slaughter and cry, that they forced the Lord Marquesse to forsake the Citie, and therein tooke Sir Thomas Cornwallis prisoner, whom they straitly kept in durance till their last overthrow. Norwich they ransacked and set on fire, whose ashes as yet fill up their ruines, and more had beene made, had not God quenched these flames by showers from Heaven.

(40) The Lord Marquesse returned, and the Rebels holding Norwich, it was more then time to looke to the maine chance; and therefore those forces that were gathered to invade others, were now thought the fittest to secure our selves, over whom was appointed the Lord John Dudley, the warlike Earle of Warwicke; hee comming to Cambridge prepared for the enemy, whither resorted the foresaid Lord Marquesse, the Lords Willoughby, Powes, and Gray, his sonnes Ambrose and Robert, with many of the Norfolke men, and the twentie three of August shewed himselfe upon the Plaine before Norwich, whence to save the effusion of bloud, hee sent Norrey and a Trumpet to summon the Citie, and to offer a generall pardon; which being againe refused, he caused his Ordnance to be planted against Saint Stevens gate, and his Pioners to breake open the brasen gate, where at many made entry, and divers were slaine.

(41) Saint Stevens gate forced open by Canon shot, the Earle of Warwicke entred the City, and with small resistance came into the Market place, where threescore Rebels were incontinently executed by Marshall law. But the Earles carriages passing thorow the Citie, were surprised and taken by the enemy, wherein was great store of powder and shot, which with triumph they convaied to their Campe, and tooke it a signe of further successe, their want consisting most in those provisions, whereupon they manned the streets of that City, and slew very many of the Kings friends, but the showers of arrowes and shot from the Kings Subjects so rained amongst them, that they were forced backe to take shelter in Monshold their hole of refuge.

(42) The Earle of Warwicke thus mastring the City, shut all the Gates, them onely excepted that gave way toward Monshold, and those hee planted with his great Artillery. The Rebels perceiving what hee went about, suddenly made downe towards the Gate, and with great courage and confused cries, fell with such violence upon their attendants, that they gave backe and fled, leaving their Ordnance to the will of the Rebels, who presently disposed them amongst their owne, so that the Earle stopped likewise these passages, and imployed all his endevour to defend the Citie, which notwithstanding he could not, the Rebels making incursions over the River from their well stored Campe: and setting the streets in many places on fire, whose ate npts so continued and prospered to evill, as some despairing of any good, counselled the Earle to bee gone. But so farre was hee from such staine of honour, that drawing forth his owne sword, commanded other to doe the like, and with an interchangeable kisse confirmed the resolution of his bold courage, a custome indeed used in greatest danger of warre. And thereupon determining another way to worke, fought to stop the passage from all convoy of victuall; which the Rebels perceiving, set fire on their Cabbins, and with ensignes displayed, entrenched themselves at the foote of the Hill, in the valley called Dussin-dale, partly upon vaine Prophecies pronounced among them by certaine wizards, who gave forth that Hob, Dic, and Hic, (meaning the Rustickes) with their Clubs should fill up the valley of Dussin-dale with the bodies of the dead.

The noble resolution of the Earle of Warwicke.

The vaine prophesie of the Rebels.

(43) The next day being the seven and twentieth of August, the Lord Generall prepared for fight, having newly received a supply of fourteene hundred Lances. But before that Mars should try his strength by sword, he sent unto them a Generall pardon for all things that were past, which when they had againe utterly rejected, he ranged his battels for fight. The Rebels likewise, set themselves in order, where in the fore-ranke all the Gentlemen whom they had taken Prisoners, were placed and coupled in Irons for starting away, so that their dangers were doubled, and themselves exposed to death aswell by their friends, as by their enemies.

The Lord Generall offered the rebels a generall pardon.

(44) But before the charge could be given, one Miles a most skilfull Gunner amongst them made shot at the Kings Standard, and strucke the Bearer thereof in the thigh, and his horse through the shoulder, which so moved the Earle that he caused a whole volley of Artillery to bee discharged against them, when Captaine Drury with his owne band and the Almanes, thrust fore upon them, and opened their Battell, whereby most of the Captive-Gentlemen escaped away, upon which brunt the Earles light horsemen came so valiantly on, that the Rebels gave backe and fled: and with the formost Robert Ket their Captaine, upon a swift horse galloped away, the Chase continued three miles and more, with the slaughter of three thousand and five hundred Rebels.

The Kings Standard strucken.

The Rebels discomfited and many slaine.

(45) Their battell thus broken, and the most part fled: those notwithstanding that kept about the Ordnance, determined to dye like men, and inclosing themselves among the Carts and Carriages, had the advantage of a Trench and certaine stakes stucke against the horsemen, whereby they stood more resolutely at defence. The Noble Earle pitying their case, and loath to loose so many brave men, sent Norrey King at Armes unto them, with proffer of pardon if they would lay downe Armes, and returne to obedience, otherwise they well saw, there was no way but death: Their answer was, that they were free borne English men, who disdained all ignominious death, whereunto they said, they were appointed, and barrels of ropes brought into the field (as they were informed) to strangle them, so that if they must needs dye, they chose the manly deathes of Souldiers, not trusting the sugred promises for surprize, and then to be trussed up like dogs.

The idle and rude ever the fittest to broach mischiefe.

The compassion of the Lord Generall.

(46) Their answer returned, and compassion still working in the Lord Generals breast, even when hee had set his whole Army against them both of horse and foote; and the signe of battell ready to have beene given, hee sent to them once more, to know if they would believe and imbrace their pardon, if hee came in person to declare it to them himselfe; whereunto they answered, that they knew him to be honourable, and would from his mouth most thankefully receive it: thereupon hee repayred unto them, and causing againe their pardon to bee read, confirmed the same with such effectuall words, as they all cast away their weapons, and with one voyce cryed, God save King Edward.

(47) The day following, Ket the Captaine of this sedition, crept into a Barne of one Master Riches of Swanington, was by two of his servants apprehended, and with twenty horsemen conveyed to Norwich where nine of the chiefest Rebels had judgement of death, and were all of them hanged upon the Oake of Reformation, which not till then, had the true note of that name. Ket with his brother William were brought unto London, and thence backe againe into Norfolke, where William Ket the younger was hanged upon the high Steeple of Windmonham, and Robert Ket the Arch-Rebell in chaines upon the Castle of Norwich, whose Citizens annually solemnized the day of their delivery with no lesse joy, then the Iewes did when they had escaped the sword of wicked Haman.

(48) These hazards set in the South, West, and East, the North likewise among them would come in for a cast, as forward and able to undergoe rebellion, and their zeale as hote as any others, the occasion conceived, was the Papall Religion abolished by Law, whose tottering top they meant to make steady by maine strength of Armes, notwithstanding the very foundations were so shrewdly undermined. The place where this canker began was Seimer in the North-riding in Yorkshire spreading it selfe further into the East-riding also, and the first broachers of this giddy heady wine; were persons no better then William Ombler a Yeoman, Thomas Dale a Parish Clerke, and one Stevenson the Post, imployed to blanch forth these businesses betwixt them.

Wil. Ombler. Tho. Dale.

Upon a blind prophesie the Northren Commotioners relye.

(49) Their pretences were faire, as to restore the Church her right, and to disburden the land of all grievances imposed: these strings ever founding, that the Pope was the Man, that King Edward was an Intruder, if not a meere heretike, that the Church had the power of both the swords, which now upon a blind prophesie they presupposed should bee drawne against the King and his Nobles, whose times (as they beleeved) should bee no more, but that the land should bee ruled by foure Governors, when the Commons should meete in a Parliament, assembled from the foure winds, which they interpreted from foure Coasts of England, whereof themselves now made the last.

(50) First therefore to raise men, and to bring all into confusion, they fired their Beacons, whence the sparkes of sedition were carried amaine; for the rudest alwayes unwilling to labour, and the fittest fewell to breake into flame, flocked together on heapes, each one having a Common-wealth in his head, and all of them disliking the reformation of religion that the King had commanded. Among these the most seditious had ever a voice which drew consent to forward the Action, and especially to beare downe the rich, whereof they made their first assay upon White a Gentleman, Savage a Marchant, Clopton and Berry; whom they cruelly murthered, and disposiling them of their apparrell, left their naked bodies on the Would before Seimer, thence passing forward from Towne to Towne, tooke many away that were unwilling to goe, and all to fulfill their perfidious prophesie.

(51) Their number now increased unto three thousand, the Country beganne to grow in great feare, especially the Gentlemen, and the richer sort, seeing their lives and substance thus thirsted for and fought after: but presently downe came the Kings pardon with profers of life, which so willingly was imbraced, that Ombler and Dale were quite forsaken, and almost left alone, who with Wright, Peacocke, Weatherell, and Buttry were worthily executed at Yorke upon the one and twenty of September following.

Ombler and others executed. Iustitia iudicii, &c.

(52) As the Commons by these tumultuous rebellions greatly disquiered the peace of the land, so the chiefest Lords did disturbe the Court of the yong King, where the greatest Counsellors through emulation and disdaine, banded each against others, without respect of themselves, or regard of their Soveraigne; whereof the Kings uncles, the Protector and Admirall are noted for the first; and with the first paid their offences with their lives: but both were the brethren of Queene Iane the Kings mother deceased, the elder Lord Edward Duke of Somerset was Protector of his Person, Realmes and Dominions. And Thomas Lord Seamer Baron of Sudley the younger, high Admirall of England, both worthy persons, had they known their own worths: for so long stood they in safety of life and true honor as the bounds of brotherhood and nature stood unviolated betwixt them: but that once broken, their lives lay open to dishonour and death.

Strife betwixt women caused the deaths of their husbands.

(53) The younger brother Lord Thomas had married Queene Katherine Parre, the last of the many wives of King Henry the eight, who undoubtedly bore himselfe no meaner by that match, neither she the state or name of a Dowager Queene: though of her selfe a woman compleate with singular humility. And the Dutchesse of Somerset matched with the greatest Peere in the Land, held her State equall to her husbands degree: and for place and precedency (as report hath divulged) the lamentable tragedy of these two great Brethren began; which now in acting brought upon the Stage at once their owne destructions, the Lands rebellions, and the griefes of the good young King, into a fatall and unrecoverable sicknesse, whereof lastly followed his death.

The hate of distentions.

(54) So subtile is the old serpent, and so ready ever, to sow tares among wheat, that he disturbed religions proceedings with all these calamities almost at one time; first, setting matters of discord betwixt them, by scandalizing tongues, then jealousies of suspitions spiced with envy; and lastly hatred unto death. Insomuch that the Protector suffered his brother to be accused and condemned in Parliament of high Treason (whether true or false, God onely knoweth) and under his owne hand writing, committed his head to the axe: whereby one of the three twisted cords of Englands strength was cut asunder by that fatall and unhappy stroake, and his owne now made loose in the Cable prooved too weake by farre to hold fast the Anchor, whereby the shipwracke of his owne life was shortly made.

The Lord Admirals inditement.

Ex Stat. Record.

(56) For the Admirall being made away by order of law, the giddy Commons without either order, or law, rose up in their Insurrections as hath beene said: And the Lords returned from their suppressions, began forthwith to envy and article against the Protector, which they published by Proclamation against him, wherein hee was accused, 1. of evill government: 2. the losse of the Kings Peeres in France: 3. to be ambitious in his buildings: 4. regardlesse of the Counsellors: 5. a sower of sedition among the Nobles: 6. dangerous to the King: 7. a scandalizer of the Councell: 8. and lastly, that he was no lesse then a Traitor. Against whom they desired the aide of the Londoners to take from him the King; to all which seventeene Counsellers subscribe their names.

Articles exhibited against the L. Protector.

(57) These Statists in consultation daily at London, and the Protector residing still with the King, intercourse of Letters were interchangeably both sent and received, whereof two, from either part one, and even at one instant were sent unto the Lord Major and and Citizens of London, requiring their aide in these their opposite quarrels, and surely in their assembly the rale of the Lords by the Recorder was so well told, as had not a grave * Citizen stept up betimes, the common Councell had granted aide against their King, whose wisdome and loyalty, in regard my selfe a Citizen, would have it recorded to his everlasting memory, and an example and motive for our obedient love and dutie toward our Soveraignes, I will insert as I finde them uttered and spoken.

* George Stradlan.

George Stradlan his Oration.

" (58) In this case (said he) good it is to thinke " on things past, to avoyd the danger of things to " come; for I remember a story written by Fabian " in his Chronicles of the warres betwixt the King " and his Barons, who even then as our Lords doe " now, demanded aide of the Major and Commons " of London, against their Soveraigne King Henry " the third, and that in a cause rightfull, and good " for the Common-weale, which was the execution " of certain wholesome lawes, somewhat derogating " from his princely prerogative, which hee would " not permit. The aide was granted, and quarrell " came unto battell, wherein the Lords prevailed, " and tooke the King and his sonne prisoners. But " they againe restored to liberty, among other con- " ditions this was one, that the King should not " onely grant his free pardon to the Lords, but also " unto the Citizens of London; which was done, yea " and the same confirmed by Parliament. But what " followed? was it forgotten? no surely, nor ne- " ver forgiven during the Kings life: for the liber- " ties of the Citie were taken away, strangers appoin- " ted to be our Heads and Governours, the Citi- " zens given away both body and goods, and from " one persecution to another, were most miserably " afflicted: such it is to enter the wrath of a Prince, " which (as Salomon saith) is death: Wherefore, for- " asmuch as this aide is required of the Kings Maje- " sty, whose voice (being our high Shepheard) we " ought to obey, rather then to hearken to the " Lords, whom nevertheless I wish not to be ut- " terly cast off; my councell is, that they with us, " and wee with them, become humble Petitioners " unto his Highnesse, that it would please him to " heare such complaints against the Lord Protector, " as may be justly alleadged and proved, and I doubt " not but this matter will be so pacified, that neither " shall the King, nor yet the Lords have cause to " seeke for further aide, neither we to offend any of " them both.

(59) These words well weighed, and the Councell dissolved, five hundred Londoners were prepared in a readinesse: for Sir Philip Hobby being sent from the Lords to the King, so delivered their minds, that the Lord Protector was commanded out of presence, and the next day being the twelfth of October, the Lords of the Councell resorted to Windsor, where they so wrought with the King, as his Vncle was delivered into their hands, whom the same night they imprisoned in Beauchamps Tower in the same Castle, and the next day strongly attended, brought him to London, whence the streets were guarded onely by houseolders, the Aldermen taking the charge of the businesse, and so to the great griefe and wondering of the people, hee was conveyed to the Tower, and there left.

Joh. Stow.

The Lord Protector committed to the Tower. 35. Fox in Acts and Mon.

(60) Whither shortly after the Lords themselves repaired, and charged the Protector with these 20. Articles as followeth:

Articles drawn against the L. Protector.

1 That at his entry into that waighty office, hee was expressely prohibited to doe any thing in State without the assent of the last Kings Executors.

2 That hee had contrariwise upon his owne authority both subverted lawes, and stayed justice, as well by letters, as commandement.

3 That he had delivered divers persons arrested and committed to prison for felony, man-slaughter, murther and treason, contrary to the lawes and statutes of the Realme.

4 That he had made Captaines and Lieutenants over waighty affaires under his owne Seale and Writing.

5 That hee had alone communicated with forraigne Ambassadors about most weighty State affaires.

6 That he had checked divers of the Kings Privy Councell, speaking for the good of the State, yea and threatned to displace them if they consented not to his mind.

7 That hee had against law erected a Court of Requests in his owne house, whither were enforced divers of the Kings Subjects to answer for their Freeholds.

8 That he had for money disposed Offices in the Kings gift, Money, Leases, and Wardes, and given presentations of Benefices, and Bishoprickes, yea and medled with sale of the Kings lands, which by office he could not, without consent of the Major voyce of the Councell, 9 That hee had commanded multiplication by Alcumistry, to the abuse of the Kings coyne.

10 That against the King and Councels will, hee had set forth a Proclamation against inclosures, which had caused dangerous insurrections in the land, wherein divers of the Kings liege Subjects have beene spoiled, and many a worthy man therein slaine.

11 That to the same end hee had given commission with Articles annexed concerning inclosures of Commons, high wayes, and decayed Cottages, giving the Commissioners authority to heare and determine the same causes, contrary to the lawes and statutes of the Realme.

12 That hee had suffered Rebels and Traitors to assemble, and lye in Campe and Armour, against the King, his Nobles and Gentlemen, without any speedy suppressing of them.

13 That by his gifts in money, with promises of Fees, rewards and services, hee had encouraged many of the said rebels.

14 That in favour of them contrary to law, he had caused a Proclamation to be made, that none of the said Rebels, or Traitors should be sued, or vexed for any of their offences committed in the said Rebellion.

15 That hee had liked well of these rebellions, and had said, that the covetousnesse of the Gentry gave the occasion, affirming that it was better for the Commons to dye, then to perish for lacke of living.

16 That hee had reported the Lords of the Parliament were loth to reforme themselves for the reformation of Inclosures, and therefore the people had good cause to reforme the things themselves.

17 That upon the report of the defaults and lackes of Bulloigne, nothing was there amended.

18 That the Forts of Newhaven and Blackneste standing in want of men and victuall, whereof hee was informed, were suffered notwithstanding still to want, to the great encouragement of the French, and dishonour of the English.

19 That he had untruly published, that the Lords at London minded to destroy the King, which he instantly desired hee would never forget, and to that end instigated many young Lords, whereby sedition and discord was made among the Nobles.

20 Lastly, that whereas the Lords assembled at London, onely to consult upon a charitable communication to be had with the Protector for his mis-government of the King and Realme, hee contrariwise sent letters of credence to many places and persons, that the said Lords were no lesse then high Traytors to the King, and great disturbers of the whole Realme.

All these accusations notwithstanding (the young King so labouring in) he was released from the Tower the first of February following unto his free liberty, though not unto his former authority, and so remained remained untouched for the space of two yeeres and two dayes.

(61) Whilest these his, and other troubles were commencing in England, the Lord Grey of Wilton left Lieutenant of the North, remained in Scotland, where many feates of warre were undergone, and many Forts fortified, and some taken, such were Lowden, Hadington, and Tester, at whose assault certaine opprobrious speeches in most contemptuous manner were uttered by a Scottish man against King Edward of England, whereat the Lord Grey was so offended, as upon composition for the delivery of the Castle, all were let goe with life, onely that person excepted, and his name knowne to be Newton, was appointed to die for the same; but he denying the words, imposed them upon one Hamilton, a man valorous enough, and wrongfully touched, who denied the accusation, and challenged Newton the combat, which he accepted, and in performance slew Hamilton, though more at disadvantage, then for lacke either of courage or strength: The victor was rewarded with a great chaine of gold, and the gowne that the Lord Grey wore at the present, though many maligned and accused him still to be the utterer of those base words.

Vpian Fulwell.

A combate fought betweene two Scottishmen before the Lord Grey.

(62) The English keeping foot still in Scotland, burnt Dawketh and Muskelburgh, and fortified Hadington both with munition and men, spoyling the Countrey, saith Bishop Lesse, all about Edenburgh, Lowthian and Mers: repaying of Forts, and placing of Garrisons, as if they meant there to remaine and abide: but their young Queene being conveyed into France, and the Scots aided with the assistance of the French, so quit themselves, that they voided their Land of the English, and recovered of them all they had lost. In which times of variable successe, the King but a child, the Nobles at variances, and the combustuous Commons obedient to neither, the French fought to recover the holds that the English had in their Countrey, and first by stealth meant to surprise the fortresse of Bulloigneberg, unto which enterprise seven thousand were chosen, under the conduct of Monsieur Chatillon.

The English forced out of Scotland.

The French intend to surprize Bulloigneberge.

(63) These secretly marching in the night with ladders and furniture meete for the enterprize, approched within a quarter of a mile unto Bulloigneberg fort, amongst whom was an English Souldier discharged out of their pay, for that he had taken a French woman to wife. This Carter, for so was his name, got entertainment under Chatillon, and now understanding whereabout they went, hastily made from his Company, and gave the Alarum to his Countrimen within the Fort; where Sir Nicholas Arnale Captaine of the Place, caused him to be drawne up betwixt two pikes to the height of the wall, unto whom he declared the attempt in hand, and among them stood so valiantly in defence of the Fort, that he gave many a wound, and received some himselfe: by him, and this meanes the Place was quit from surprizall, and the slaughter of the French so great, that fifteene Waggons went laden away with dead Corpes.

The good service of Carter, an English Souldier.

(64) This losse sustained, and the English masters in those parts of their Maine, the French sought to trie fortune for their Isles in the Seas, namely, Garnesey and Jersey, possest and subject to King Edwards Crowne, their preparations were great, and their Marshalliits many; which notwithstanding with such losse were beaten backe from their bankes, as a thousand men at Armes were slaine in the attempt, and the successe so unfortunate, as the French for feare of further discouragement, forbad the report, and made an inhibition, not to mention the expedition of that journey.

A great slaughter of the French.

The French assault the Isles of Garnesey and Jersey.

(65) Nevertheless, the French King ceased not his desired purposes, till hee had got by surrender Hambletowne, Blackneste, Bulloigneberg, and the Towne of Bulloigne it selfe, though bought at a deare rate, and delivered with great griefe to the English; unto Bulloigneberge upon composition delivered to the French.

such a lamentable state, and dishonourable composition was the good King Edward brought, by the bandings of his great Counsellors, and insurrections of his unruly Commons; after which calamities a great and mortall disease followed; namely the sweating sicknesse, that raged extreamely through the Land, wherein dyed the two sonnes of Charles Brandon, both of them Dukes of Suffolke, besides an infinite number of men in their best strengths, which followed onely Englishmen in forraine Countreys no other people infected therewith, whereby they were both feared and shunned in all places where they came.

John Caius.

An. Dom. 1550. The sweating sicknesse.

(66) And to fill up the dolours of these dolefull times, the good Duke of Sommerset was againe apprehended, even when the least suspition was of any undirect workings: for upon his first releasement, to linke a firme love betwixt him and the potent Earle of Warwicke his most malignant; a marriage was contracted betwixt the Lord Lisle his eldest sonne and heire, and the Lady the Earles eldest daughter, which was solemnized with great joy at Sheene, in presence of the young King; this amity was outwardly carried with all faire shewes for a time, though inward hatred lay secretly hid, as by the sequell incontinently appeared: for after a solemne creation of many Estates, wherein the Earle of Warwicke had his style raised to be Duke of Northumberland, (unto whose rayes at that time most of the Courtiers cast their eyes) the sparkes of emulation began presently to breake forth; where the simplicity of the one, gave advantage to the other, to compasse that which long had beene fought.

Joh. Stow.

(67) The Duke of Sommerset not well adviséd, and yeelding too much unto Sycophant flatteries, was put in feare of some sudden attempt intended against him, and therefore counselled to weare under his garment a coate of defence, which hee accordingly did, and being so armed, came unto the Councell Table, supposing no man had knowne of any such thing; but his bosome being opened, and the Armour perceived, hee was forth-with apprehended, as intending the death of some Counsellor, and by Northumberland so vehemently taxed (who in Councell was ever the principall man) that he was forth-with attached, and sent to the Tower, upon the sixteenth of October, with the Lord Grey of Wilton, Sir Michael Stanhop, Sir Thomas Arundel, Sir Ralph Fane, and Sir Miles Partridge, and the next day the Durchesse his wife was likewise committed; all of them for suspition of treason and felony; and he standing so indited, upon the * second of December following, was arraigned at Westminster, attended with the Axe of the Tower, Billes, Halberds, and Pollaxes a great number.

Joh. Stow. An. Dom. 1551.

* Stow saith the fifth.

(68) His inditement was for treason and felony, and the same urged unto extremity, with many amplifications, and bitter invectives, especially that he had fought and pretended the deaths of the Duke of Northumberland, the Lord Marquesse, and Pembrooke: where after many milde answeres to these matters objected, he put himselfe to be tried by his Peeres, who acquitted him of treason, but found the inditement of felony: when presently the Axe was commanded away, whereat the shout of the people shewed the great affection that was borne to the Duke: little mistrusting that the sentence of death was pronounced against him, or that the Kings Vncle should die as a fellon; neither did the Statute intend any such thing, as some are of opinion, but rather was purposely made for the suppression of rebellions, and unlawfull assemblies, wherein such as should seeke or procure the death of any Counsellor, should be guilty as in case of felony. But such was the pleasure of the all ordering power, that he which knew no theft, should die for that sinne; so that neither himselfe, nor his wisest Counsellors, demanded the benefit of his Clergy, which would have saved his life, if it had beene required.

(69) His sentence thus pronounced, hee was again sent backe to the Tower, wherein he kept a very sad Christmas, yea, and that in the Court, inclined to little mirth, (the King lamenting the condemnation of his Vncle) had not some witty disports broke off his passions, which how, and by whom they proceeded, let others report, and us continue the Tragedy of this Duke; who upon the two and twenty of February following, being Friday, was brought to the Scaffold upon Tower-hill, by eight in the morning, where turning himselfe towards the East, he spake to the people, as followeth.

The Duke of Somerset speech at his death.

(70) Dearely beloved friends, I am brought hither to suffer death, albeit I never offended against the King, neither in word nor deed, and have alwayes beene as faithfull, and true unto this Realme, as any man hath beene: but forasmuch as I am by law condemned to die, I doe acknowledge my selfe as well as others to bee subject thereunto: wherefore to testifie mine obedience which I owe to the lawes, I am come hither to suffer death, whereunto I willingly offer my selfe, with most hearty thankes unto God, that hath given mee this time of repentance, who might through sudden death have taken away my life, that I neither should have acknowledged him, nor my selfe.

A great feare without any cause.

(71) These words uttered, besides others exhortatory, that the people would continue constant in the Gospel, suddenly was heard a great noyse, whereby the assembly was strucke into great feare, some thinking that a storme or tempest descended from above, some supposed that the barrels of Gunpowder in the Armory had taken fire, and were all blowne up into the Ayre, others thought that they heard a noyse of Horses prepared to battell, some againe affirmed confidently, that it did thunder, and others thought verily it was an earth-quake, and that the ground moved: unto such confusion and terrour were they presently brought, which (saith Stow) was none other, but that certaine men from the Hamlets warned with weapon to guard the Tower-hill, came thither somewhat after the houre appointed, whose formost seeing the Prisoner on the Scaffold, beganne to runne forward themselves, and call to their fellowes to come away: which word away, sounding as an Eccho in the peoples eares, they thought that rescue had come to the Duke to take him away: and seeing the Bil-men to make forward so fast, beganne themselves to shrinke backe from the hill, every man seeking to save one, and by this accident and confused cries, this feare among them fell and beganne: This stirre scarce ended, another ensued by the running of the people towards the Scaffold, who seeing Sir Anthony Browne riding thitherward, supposed a pardon had come from the King, so that a sudden shout arose, Apardon, a pardon, God save the King; by which it onely appeared in what love hee was had, and how much his life was desired of the Commons.

Stows Annals.

The Duke entirely beloved of the Commons.

(72) The Duke whose minde being altogether prepared for death, was little moved either to hope, or feare, and thereupon addressed his second speech to the people, and with no dejected countenance spake againe and said: Beloved friends there is no such matter intended as you vainely hope and beleeve: It seemeth good thus to the Almighty, unto whose ordinance it is meet that wee all be obedient, wherefore I pray you be quiet and without tumult, for I am quiet, and let us so joyne in prayer unto the Lord, for the preservation of our Noble King, unto whose Majesty I wish continuall health, with all felicitie and abundance of prosperous successe. Moreover, I wish to his Councellors the grace and favour of God, whereby they may rule all things uprightly with Iustice, unto whom I exhort you all in the Lord, to shew your selves obedient, the which is also very necessarie for you, under paine of condemnation, and also most profitable for the preservation of the Kings Majestie. And thereupon asking every man forgiveneſſe, freely forgave every man againſt him, and desiring the people to be quiet, leſt the flesh should be troubled, though his spirit was willing, hee meekely laide downe his head to the Axe, and received at one stroke his rest by death.

The Duke of Somerset speech at the Scaffold.

(73) How soever this Dukes cause was ballanced by law, and him taken away that flood betwixt some, and their Sunne; yet was his death heavily digested by the people, that spake very bitterly against the Duke of Northumberland; but most especially the young King sore mourned, and soone missed the life of his Protector thus unexpectedly taken away, who now deprived of both his Vncles, howsoever the times were passed with pastimes, playes, and shewes, to drive away dumpes, yet ever the remembrance of them sate so neere unto his heart, that lastly he fell sicke of a Cough, which grievously increasing, ended with a consumption of the lungs.

King Edward falleth sicke.

(74) His sicknesse continuing with great doubt of his life, upon purpose, saith Grafton, to alter the succession of the Crowne, three marriages were in one day solemnized, whereof the first was betwixt the Lord Guilford Dudley, fourth sonne to the Duke of Northumberland, and the Lady Iane, eldest daughter of Henry Duke of Suffolke: the second was betwixt the Lord Herbert, sonne and heire to William Earle of Pembrook, and the Lady Katherine, the yonger daughter of the said Duke of Suffolke, and the third was betweene Henry Lord Hastings, sonne and heire of Francis Earle of Huntington, and Katherine the youngest daughter of the Duke of Northumberland, which tending, (saith he) to the disinheriting of the rightfull heires, they proved nothing prosperous, for two of them were presently made frustrate, the one by death, and the other by divorce.

Rich. Grafton.

Three marriages intended to divert the succession.

(75) The policy established, and languishing sicknesse of the King gave way unto such, as sought the everſion of the State, and alienation of the Crowne: In whose eye no head was seene fitter for that faire Diademe, then was Guilfords Bride, Iane the elder daughter of Suffolke, whose mother, Lady Frances then living, was the daughter of Mary the French Queene, the younger sister to King Henry the eight, unto whom King Edward over-wrought in his weaknesse, ordained his Crowne by Will, at the suggestions of such Politiques, as meant to disinherite the two lawfull Princes, Mary, and Elizabeth, and to impugne the Statute, in case provided for the succession of King Henry the eight his Children: unto which Will (O griefe to heare) subscribed all the Kings Councell, most of the Nobility, the reverend Bishops, and all the Iudges of the Land, one onely excepted, even Sir Iames Hales Knight, a Iustice of the Common Pleas, upright in judgement, and a favourer of the Gospell, he, I say, never would write or consent to the disinheriting of the Lady Mary.

Lady Iane made successor by sicke King Edward.

Vide Stat. in An. 35. de R. 8. M. Fox in Act. & Mon.

Sir James Hales refused to subscribe to King Edwards Will.

(76) The King thus accomplishing what his Statists had wrought, lay languishing in his faintnesse: the end whereof could not be expected but onely by death, and now being worne almost to nothing (his last breath drawing to the limits of Nature) he lift up his eyes with a prepared heart, and prayed as followeth.

King Edwards Prayer.

Lord God deliver mee out of this miserable and wretched life, and take me among thy Chosen: howbeit not my will, but thy will be done, Lord I commit my Spirit to thee: O Lord thou knowest how happy it were for me to be with thee: yet for thy Chosen sake, if it be thy will, send me life, and health, that I may truely serve thee: O my Lord blesse thy people, and save thine Inheritance: O Lord God save thy Chosen people of England. O my Lord God, defend this Realme from Papistrie, and maintaine thy true Religion, that I and my people may praise thy holy Name, for thy Sonne Iesus Christs sake.

So turning his face, and seeing some by him, said I thought you had not beene so nigh: yes, said Doctor Owen, we heard you speake to your selfe; then said the King, I was praying to God: O I am faint, Lord have mercy upon me, and receive my spirit: and in so saying, gave up the Ghost, to the great losse of England, in whom they had conceived most hopes.

(77) His vertues were rare and many, exceeding most most Princes; and vices so few, that none can be taxed with lesse; very learned (according to his yeeres) he was in the Latine and Greek tongues, the French, Spanish, and Italian, yea (and saith Hieronymus Cardanus) he was adorned with the skill of Logicke, naturall Philosophie, and Musicke, and for Astronomy (saith he) my selfe had experience, whom he learnedly opposed of the cause and course of Comets: for Humanity, he is the very Image of Morality, and in Princely grave Majesty best beseeming a King: briefly he may well seeme to be a miracle in Nature: nor doe I speake thus Rhetorically to amplifie things, or to make them more then truth is for the truth is more then I doe utter: and in this hee was most admirable, that hee could tell and recite all the Ports, Havens, and Creekes, not within his owne Realme onely, but also in Scotland, and likewise in France, what comming in there was, how the tide served in every of them, what burden of Shippe, and what winde best served the comming in into them.

(78) Of all his Nobles, Gentry, Iustices, and Magistrates, hee tooke speciall name of their Hospitality, and religious conversations, and that which is best accepted of a Prince, hee was very liberall, loving, mercifull, meeke, and gentle towards his people, and so farre from bloud, as he ever favoured and spared as much as might be the life of man, yea, even of Rebels, as we have seene; neither was hee willing to put Heretikes to death, as in a certaine disserration had once with Master Cheeke it appeared: insomuch that when Ioan Butcher should bee burned for her hereſie, all the Councell could not move him to set his hand to the warrant of her execution, untill Doctor Crasmer his Godfather, Archbishop of Canterbury laboured to induce him, unto whom he said, what my Lord, will you have me to send her quicke to hell? and taking the pen, used this speech: I will lay all the charge hereof upon Crasmer before God. Then how his hand had beene gotten for his Vncles death, is to be admired.

(79) But his constancy unto Christs Gospell, with the abandoning of all superstition, was very admirable, one example among many wee will not let to declare. Lady Mary his sister through the suit of Charles the Emperour, made great meanes to have Masse said in her House, and that to be done without all prejudice of law: the greatneſſe of her person being the immediate successor, and the might of the Emperour in amity with England, moved the Councell to give their consent to the suit; to forward which, Cranmer Archbishop of Canterbury, accompanied with Ridley Bishop of London, were employed from them to the King, who hearing their message, gave the replication so grounded upon Scripture, as they gave over to urge more that way: but like Politicians alleaged the danger in breach of amity with the Emperour, to which the King answered, he would rather adventure the hazard of his owne life, then to grant that which was nor agreeable to the truth. The Bishops yet urged him with the bonds of nature, and submissively said, they would have no nay: the King seeing himselfe so importunated, burst into weeping, and sobbingly desired them to be content, whereat the teares so abundantly burst from their eyes, as they departed his presence not able to speake. And for a further testimony of this yong Kings zeale, reade if you please a letter sent unto his sister the Princesse Lady Mary, out of the originall.

(80) Right deare, and right entirely beloved sister, we greet you well, and let you know that it grieveth us much to perceive no amendment in you of that, which wee for good cause, your soules health, our conscience, and common tranquility of our Realme have so long desired, assuring you, that our sufferance hath more demonstration of naturall love, then contentation of our conscience, and forefight of our safety. Wherefore, although you give us occasion asmuch almost as in you is, to diminish our naturall love; yet be we loath to feele it decay, and meane not to be so care- lesse of you as we be provoked. And therefore meaning your weale, and therewith joysing a care not to be found guilty in our owne conscience to God, having cause to require forgivenesse, that wee have so long for respect of love towards you, omitted our bounden duty, we doe send at this present our right trusty, and right well beloved Councellor, the Lord Rich, our Chancellor of England, our trusty and right welbeloved Councellor, Sir Anthony Wingfield Knight, Comptroler of our Household, and Sir Will. Peter Knight, one of our two principall Secretaries, in message to you touching the order of your house, willing you to give them firme credite in those things they shall say to you from us, and doe there in our Name. Given under our Signet at the Castle of Windsor, the of in the fifth yeere of our Raigne, 1552.

King Edwards great care for the poore.

(81) The fruites of which Religion, this godly King shewed by his workes of compaſſion towards the poore, and that especially upon the foundation of Christs Hospitall, the late suppressed place of the Grey-Fryers in London, upon occasion as followeth. It chanced the reverend Bishop Doctor Ridley to preach before his Majesty at Westminster, wherein hee Christian-like exhorted the rich to be mercifull unto the poore, and to that end amplified the words of the Text against the mercilesse rich, and the negligence of such as were in great place. The Sermon ended, and the King set to dinner, he sent to the Bishop, commanding him not to depart the Court, before hee knew his further pleasure, and thereupon causing two Chaires to be set in the Gallery, all others avoided, he compelled the Bishop to sit downe by his side, and in no wise would admit him to be uncovered.

D. Ridleyes Sermon before King Edward.

The conference betwixt the King, and Bishop Ridley.

(82) Where entring conference, he first gave him hearty thankes for his Sermon, repeating unto him the chiefe points thereof, and comming to his exhortation for the poore, he then told him that hee thought himselfe first touched in the speech; for said he, my Lord, you speake to them in authority, whereof under God I am the chiefe, and must first make answere to him if I be negligent, and therefore I thinke you principally meant me: Gods commandement I know most expressly injoyneth us to have compaſſion of his poore members, for whom we must make account; and truly my Lord, I am most willing to travell that way, not doubting but that your long approved learning and wiſdome, whose zeale is such as witheth them helpe; but that also you had conference with others what is best herein to be done, which I am also desirous to know, and therefore I pray say freely your mind.

King Edwards Letter delivered to the Lord Major.

(83) The mover unto these pious considerations little looking for such questions of the Prince, sate a while silent, overjoyed at his words, and lastly, unprepared of any present instructions, told the King that the Citizens of London were best able to direct the plot, whose great charity, and well ordered governement, besides their daily charges, being overburdened with poore, had sufficient experience, and if it would please his Majesty to direct his letters unto them himselfe, he would be very ready to further this godly resolution so far as his meanes might any wife extend: whereupon the King presently commanded his letters to be writ, and would not suffer the Bishop to depart, before himselfe had thereto set his hand and signet, desiring him to deliver the same to the Lord Major, and with him to conferre about this buſineſſe, which hee wiſhed might be accomplished with all expedition.

The Kings great liberality to the poore in London.

(84) The Bishop as ready as the King was desirous, posted apace to the Lord Major of London, where delivering the letter, offered his assistance to forward the worke, and they together with some Aldermen, and twenty foure Commoners agreed upon three degrees of the poore, and divided them againe into nine.

(86) The Kings charitable giftes confirmed by Charter, and a Petition exhibited for liberty to take in Mortmaine of lands to a yeerely value without further licence, a place being left in the Patent to contain the summe, King Edward presently called for penne and inke, and with his owne hand filled uppe the space with these words, foure thousand Markes by yeere: which done, hee burst foorth and said; Lord God I yeeld thee most heartie thankes, that thou hast given me life thus long to finish this worke to the glory of thy name.

(87) Now as this godly King was carefull in redeeming the time, so likewise to take as it were an account of himselfe, hee kept a journall booke or Record written with his owne hand, how all things proceeded with him, and with the State, even from the first day of his raigne unto his death: whose many vertues as they were inferior to none of his worthy Progenitors, and zeale little short to the best Kings of Iudah, so was hee soone mist of all his loyall Subjects, when the bosome of Gods Saints were opened to the persecutors swords.

MARIE QVEENE OF ENGLAND, FRANCE AND IRELAND, DEFENDER OF THE FAITH, &c. THE SIXTIETH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISH, HER RAIGNE, MARRIAGE, ACTS, AND DEATH.

CHAPTER XXIII.

KING EDVVARDS life ended by his lingring disease, and the Statesmen intending to establish his will; the space of two dayes his death was kept secret, and much consultation among the Nobility had of the businesse; all of them affecting the election of Iane, lest Marie should undoe what Edward had done; to support which purpose, many projects were cast, and many opinions given how to proceed, yet all joyntly light in this point, That London was the hand which must reach Iane the Crowne: whose Citizens assistance if they might be got, the greatest difficulty (as they held it) was halfe undergone. And therefore to mould them for Iane, and to marre them for Mary, the Councell sent for the Lord Major of London, sixe Aldermen, and twelve Commoners Merchants.

Consultation for the disposing of the Crowne.

London the first stay in stead of trouble.

(2) These comming to the Court, were secretly certified of K. Edward his death, where his Will was declared, and Letters Patents shewed for the disinheriting of his two sisters, and the raising of Suffolkes daughter unto the Crowne; whose religion was so zealous, and vertues so many (as in truth no Princesse was possessed with more) were so well set forth by these grave Counsellors that the Lord Major and Citizens tooke their oathes for Lady Iane, unto whose obedience they promised to secure the City.

The Lord Major and Citizens sworne to Lady Iane.

(3) Lady Mary at Hunsdon hearing these newes, presently removed to her Mannor of Keningall in Norfolke: from whence shee wrote her Letters unto the Lords of the Councell, wherein shee marvelleth that her brothers death should so long be kept from her

The Lords answer to Lady Maries Letter.

(4) Vnto which Letters the Lords forthwith made answere; first signifying that by good warrant of ancient Lawes of the Land, besides the will of their last King, confirmed under his hand and broad Seale, in the presence of the most part of the Nobles, Counsellors, Iudges and other grave personages assenting and subscribing to the same, that Lady Iane daughter to Henry Duke of Suffolke should bee invested and succeed him in the Emperiall Crowne: unto whom therefore, and unto none other, they must give their loyall subjection; where also they put her in minde of the unlawfull marriage and divorce of her mother, her owne illegitimation, uncapable of Crowne, or rule of Dominions; willing her further to desist from any such claime, and to submit her selfe unto Queene Iane now her Soveraigne, so would they hold amity with her, else should she proove grievous unto them and her selfe, which letters were sent from the Tower of London the ninth of Iuly, 1553. and subscribed by the hands of such as follow:

(5) These Letters received, and the Lords mindes therein made knowne, shee forthwith removed to Fremingham Castle, standing more safe from invasion or easie accesse; unto whom the Suffolke men were the first that resorted, offering their service unto her rightfull cause, with condition they might still imbrace the Gospell in the same manner as King Edward had established it; to which shee condiscended, though afterwards wearing the Diademe, and petitioned unto for promise, shee both punished the Writer, and answered their expectations, That they should one day well know, they being but members should not direct her their Head.

Iane proclaimed Queene.

An. Dom. 1553. July 10.

(6) The Lords at London to set their enterprise upon foot, by proclamation made knowne in most parts of the City, the death of King Edward, and that by Will, hee had bequeathed his Crowne and Dominions, to the vertuous great Princesse, Lady Iane, daughter to Henrie Duke of Suffolke (as wee have said) and so was shee proclaimed by the name of Queene Iane, though many of the Commons wished it had beene Queene Mary; and for some words spoken to that purpose, one Gilbert Pot a seruant Vintner, upon the Pillary lost both his eares. Vnto the aide of Lady Mary came the Earles of Sussex, Bath, and Oxford, the Lord Wentworth, Sir Thomas Cornwallis, Sir Henry Iernyngham, Sir William Waldgrave, with divers others of Norfolke and Suffolke, yea, and the Citizens of Norwich themselves, having certaine knowledge of King Edwards death, forthwith proclaimed Mary for Queene, and presently sent her aide both of men and munition. The Lords then hearing of great preparations, meant betimes to overmatch her in power, and thereupon agreed that Henry Duke of Suffolke their new Queenes Father should with an Army repaire into Norfolke, which thing was so grievous unto Lady Iane his daughter, that with flouds of teares shee obtained his stay.

Many Noble men come to aide Mary.

Mary proclaimed Queene fifth in Norwich, July 12.

(7) None then was held fitter to undergoe this great businesse, then was the Duke of Northumberland, y young Gilfords Father, (who besides his fonnes dignity, unto whom this new Queene was wife) his valiant parts and sufficiency to marshall an Army in Field, had been often experienced in Scotland, and but lately among these people with whom hee was now to deale. The Duke thus appointed, beganne as it should seeme, to mistrust the worst, and thereupon freely uttered his minde to the Lords; willing them to be carefull at home, as hee would bee venturous abroad; for their cause was common, and all for the Queene. Hee with his (hee said) went now to venture their bodies to the bloudy strokes of warre, their Families and Children left to the disposse of others, whom as he told them; if they meant not faire play, hee could avoid as well as any: thus much and more spoken to the like purpose, one of the Lords replied, and said: Your Grace (as I judge) doth cast this doubt over farre, for which of us all, can wash our hands cleane of this businesse, therefore it behoveth us to be resolute, as much as it doth you: and among them Arundell wilfred that he might goe with him.

The Duke of Northumberlands Souldiers forsake him.

The feare of the Duke of Northumberland.

(8) All things in a readinesse, and his commission confirmed under the broad Seale of England, upon the 14 of Iuly the Duke with six hundred men, accompanied with Lord Grey, and others, set foorth of London, and tooke his way through Shordiech, where beholding the countenances of the people, he spake to the Lord Grey and said: The people my Lord, presse still to see us, but not one of them bids us Gods speed: the same day likewise Sir John Gates went after the Duke both of them making for New-Market, whither further supplies were promised to be sent.

The milde beginnings of Queene Mary.

(9) In the meane time the Lord Windsore, Sir Edmund Peckham, Sir Robert Drurie, and Sir Edward Hastings raised the Commons of Buckinghamshire, proclaiming Queene Marie ever as they went, the like did Sir Iohn Williams of Tame, and Sir Leonard Chamberlaine in Oxfordshire, and so did Sir Thomas Tresham in the County of Northampton: these with many more made forward toward Norfolke, unto whom many more joyned in the way: and as God and good hap brought it to passe, five tall Ships well manned that were appointed before Yarmouth to have taken Lady Mary if shee had fled, were by foule weather driven into the Haven, where master Iernyngham was raising for her, and taking a Boate to hale them, the Sea-souldiers demaunded what he would have, his answer was, their Captaines; whereunto the souldiers consented, threatning to throw them into the Sea, if they refused to serve Queene Marie: the Ships thus gotten, and their number augmented, their terrour grew fearefull to the Lords in the Tower: vvhose Tenants began then likevvise to drawv backe, and deny them their aide: so that certaine of them vvould faine have been gone, if by any meanes they could have escaped the Tovver, vvhich the Lord Treasurer assayed, but vvas brought backe againe about midnight.

Queene Mary proclaimed in London. Iul. 19.

(10) The Duke of Northumberland in as great feare as any, tooke still his stations according to his Commission, sending still to the Lords for their promised supplies, berwixt whom were such posting of Letters, such speeding to and fro, such outward faire promises, such inward privie practises, such talking of the Souldiers, and such heart-burning of the people, as it was a world to see: and the rumour of Souldiers from all quarters daily resorting unto Queene Marie, made the turmoile much the more. To leave therefore nothing unassayed that might support their new made Queene Iane, the Councell commanded Doctor Ridley Bishop of London, to maintaine her cause in his Sermon made at Pauls-Crosse, which hee did upon Sunday the sixteenth of Iuly, but that neither working, nor the peoples affection drawne from the rightfull Successor, the Lords fell from the Duke, who then was in Burie, and in London proclaimed Lady Marie Queene.

(11) This sudden alteration brought many sudden feares into the Dukes breast, whose onely way, as he well saw, was to follow the streame, and now returning to Cambridge, his Souldiers began to turne in affection, most of them forsaking his company, a few onely excepted, whose perils were deepely engaged with his, where to shew his forwardnesse for the advancement of Marie, wanting both Trumpet and Herauld at hand, himselfe accompanied with the Major, and the Marquesse of Northampton, in the Market place proclaimed her Queene: which done in token of joy, hee threw up his owne Cap. And thus the right reverted to whom it belonged, wee will now addresse our stile to her dreadfull Raigne, wherein the Kingdomes story may seeme to be writ rather with bloud then with Inke, and the nursing mother, (as Queenes by the Prophet are termed and called) to forget the naturall affection due to her Subjects, which in some sort may be compared to the children of her wombe.

The Duke of Northumberland arrested.

(12) Yet were her beginnings both milde and gentle, pardoning all offenders in case of Lady Iane; excepting the Duke of Northumberland, the onely doer, and Sir John Gates, Captaine of the Guard, who was in Armes against her, with some few others that worthily suffered for that offence. The Duke (as is said) laying downe weapon, and himselfe proclaiming Queene Marie, was neverthelesse arrested with Francis Earle of Huntington, in the Kings Colledge at Cambridge by a Sergeant at Armes, but Letters being then sent from the Councell, that every man should bee dismissed without further trouble, the Duke among them was also released.

Sixe Ships taken to serve Queene Mary.

(13) The next morning Henry Fitz-Alan, Earle of Arundel, came into Cambridge from the Queene, who entring his Chamber, the Duke at his feet fell upon his knees, desiring him for Gods love to consider his case, that had done nothing without warrant of him, and the Councell; my Lord, said Arundel, I am sent hither from the Queene to arrest you, and I, said the Duke, obey your arrest, yet I beseech your Lordship to use mercy towards him whose Acts have beene no more then was enjoyned by Commission. That sooner should you have fought for, said the Earle, and thereupon committed him to Guard, and left him to the mercy of the Queene.

(15) Queene Mary from Fremingham repaired towards London, being all the way saluted without any mislikes, saving that many men feared the altering of Religion: at her entrance into the Tower were released Thomas Duke of Norfolke, who had laine there from the last of King Henrie the eighth, Edward Lord Courtney, whom shee forthwith advanced Earle of Devonshire, Cuthert Tunstall, Bishop of Durham, and Stephen Gardiner late Bishop of Winchester, by her then made Lord Chancellor of England. From the Marshall-sea was freed Edmund Bonner, Bishop of London, and now againe restored by the deposing of Doctor Ridley, who for his Sermon lately made, was committed to the Tower; so likewise Doctor Scorie gave place unto Daye, in the Bishopricke of Chichester, Miles Coverdale unto Wefse, in the Bishopricke of Excester, and John Hooper unto Heath, in the Bishopricke of Worcester; who forthwith was committed to the Fleet, and Archbishop Cranmer, into the Tower; so roughly she began with the reformed Clergie, how milde soever her other proceedings were.

Reported in a Letter of conference with her had by the Lord Chancellor and Secretary Peters.

(17) Her entrance thus standing, and State nothing safe (as shee thought) whilest the Duke of Northumberland (a Protestant) and other his Complices (for the most part in durance) were alive; their arraignements were haftened, and deaths not long after lingred, which they suffered upon the Scaffold on Tower-Hill, where the Duke having promise of life, if he would recant his profession, Dastard-like with Peter, forsooke his Master, and exhorted the people to the Romish profession: which his death Sermon afterwards by authority came forth in Print. (19) The next that felt the calamities of those times, were the Lady Iane, and the Lord Gilford Dudley her Husband; both innocent persons in that which their Fathers had done: Shee doubtlesse was a Lady of admirable gifts both in learning, religion, and humane knoledge, as by her conference with Feckuam, Letters to an Apostata, exhortation to her Sister, and prayers by her made in most feeling manner, doe evidently appeare, and that thee was constrained to consent to the things done, is manifest by a letter sent to her father a little before her death: wherein, after a holy and dutifull exhortation unto patience, shee useth this Speech. My deare Father, (if I might without offence rejoyce in mine owne misfe-haps, shee seemes in this I may account my self e blessed, that, washing my hands with the innocency of my fact, my guiltlesse bloud may cry before the Lord, mercie, mercie, to the Innocent. And yet though I must acknowledge, that being constrained, and as you wot well enough continually assayled, in taking upon mee, I seemed to consent, and therein offended the Queene and her Lawes, yet doe I assuredly trust that this mine offence towards God is much the lesse, in that being in so royall estate as I

(20) Yet must the Law for so great an offence take place, for triall whereof this late titled Queene, and now miserable Lady, was brought into Guildhall in London, where thee with the Lord Guilford, Archbishop Cranmer, and the Lord Ambrose Dudlie, were arraigned and condemned. But Cranmer (as Fox saith) was acquit of Treason, and stood onely in the case of Doctrine, which then was accounted Heresie, and so againe were returned to the Tower, for whom great lamentations were made, especially for the good Lady Iane, whose state the Queene her selfe so pitried, as that she had the liberty of the Tower to walke in the Queenes Garden, and on the Hill; and surely had not her Father after his first offence fallen into another, she had beene (as was thought) pardoned of life.

Fox Acts. and Monuments.

(21) His second offence was, that whereas Queene Mary had a purpose to marry with the Spaniard, and to that end embraced, the sute of Philip, the sonne of Charles the Emperour, many as well Nobles as others disliked the Match, fearing not onely the change of Religion, whereunto many of them stood very well affected, but even of the Lands servitude unto strangers, as was likely to happen, both in the Husband and Issue. To prevent which, this Henrie Duke of Suffolke, but lately pardoned of life, secretly departed unto Leicester, and Warwickshire, making Proclamations for the abandoning of Strangers, and instigated the people to withstand the Queenes marriage agreed upon with Philip.

Iohn Stow.

(22) These stirres thus abroach, the Earle of Huntington was sent into those parts, who taking Coventree (which Citie Suffolke thought himselfe sure of) forelaid the Countrey in such wise, as the Duke for his best refuge committed himselfe to the trust and secret keeping of a servant of his, called Vnderwood, remaining in Astley Parke, who against the trust reposed, treacherously betrated him, and his brother John Lord Grey, unto the Earle, whence presently by him they were conveyed prisoners unto the Tower of London, their other brother Lord Thomas escaping in the dead of the night, was presently apprehended in the borders of Wales, and from thence was brought prisoner to London.

(23) This (I say) seemed to hasten the death of those innocents, whom their Fathers had doubly brought into danger; for the Satisfs of those times, knowing their Queene could have no quiet whileft these great oppositres were reared against her, held it best policy to take them away; whereupon the twelfth of February, and first day of the weeke, Lord Guilford Dudley was had to the Scaffold upon Tower-Hill, and there with prayers and great pennancy ended his life: whose body all bloudy laid in a Cart together with the head wrapped in a cloth, was brought into the Chappell within the Tower, even in the sight of this sorrowfull Lady; a spectacle more deadly then was the Axe of her death. And now her owne part next to be acted, the Stage of her Tragedy was raised upon the Greene, within the Tower, whereon being mounted, with a cheerefull countenance, and a patient minde, these words with great constancy she spake at that present.

This done, the Headsman kneeled known, and askt her forgivenesse, unto whom she said; The Lord forgive thee, and I doe: and I pray thee dispatch me quickly, and kneeling againe, said, Will you take it off before I lie downe? hee answered, no Madam. Then she tyed a Handkercher over her eyes, and feeling for the blocke, said; Where is it, where is it? Lastly, laying her necke upon the same, stretched forth her body, and said; Lord Iesus into thy hands I commend my spirit; which was scarcely uttered, before thee received the fatall stroake of the Axe: and thus ended the life of this chaste, innocent, and most vertuous Lady; whose case, through the severity of the Law adjudged accordingly, yet was her death much lamented of all, but most especially grievous unto him that gave the sentence of the same, even Iudge Morgan, who thereupon presently fell madde, and in his ravings, continually cryed, take away the Lady Iane from me, and in that horrour shortly ended his life. I will not avouch that shee was with childe at the day of her death, though it was so reported, but rather judge a more Christian-like proceeding against so great a person; though the time (as we well know) proved very bloudy.

The Duke of Norfolke Generall for the Queene.

(31) The Queenes friends thus defeated, were in a marvellous rage, and hasting forward, overtooke Sir Henry, and the two Knevets, before they could ascend the height of the Hill, where presently began a most hot skirmish, many wounds given, and many Prisoners taken, till lastly the seditious were scattered, and fled; Sir Henry Isley into Hampshire, and others into other parts, a few escaping to joyne with their Consorts.

The seditious put to flight.

(32) The beginning thus unfortunate, made many to misdoubt of the end, among whom Sir George Harper got from Wyat, and submitted himselfe to the Duke of Norfolke, who with Sir Henry Iernegham Captaine of the Guard, Sir Edward Bray, Sir John Fog, and others, upon Monday the twentie seven of Ianuary, came unto Stroud neere Rochester and there being busied in planting of his Ordonance, was certainly told that the Londoners meant to betray him: whereat fore astonied, and turning about, he saw Captaine Bret, and the Band of white Coates at his backe, crying, We are all Englishmen, wee are all Englishmen: which sudden conspiracy caused the Duke and the Captaine of the Guard, to shift for themselves, and left their unfaithfull followers, to the dispose of their owne affections unto Wyat; among whom Sir George Harper lately received of the Duke, lightly turned againe unto Wyat. This Duke (saith Grafton) being anaged man, and fortunate before in all his warres, upon this disaster impressed such dolour of minde, that for very griefe thereof he lived not long after.

(33) Wyat, and his associates greatly incouraged by this new supply, with eight brasse Peeces taken of the Queenes, besides other of their owne, marched the next morning unto Cowling Castle, where the Lord Cobham then lay, and bending these Ordonance against the Gate, brake it open with their shot, and made entrance for their men. The Lord Cobham right valiantly resisted their doings, and bestowed freely such small Munition as he had, against their breasts, even with his owne hands: in which enterprize two of his men were slaine, and Wyat after some talke had with the said Lord, departed unto Gravesend, where hee with his men were lodged that night.

Wyat assaileth Cowling Castle.

(34) The next day hee came unto Dartford, whither resorted Sir Edward Hastings, Master of the Horse, and Sir Thomas Cornwallis, Knights, both of them being Privy Counsellors to the Queene. Their comming signified, Sir Thomas Wyat with certaine Gentlemen went forth to meet them, Wyat somewhat marching before the rest with a partizan in his hand, at whose approach Sir Edward Hastings alighted, and spake unto him as followeth.

Two Privy Counsellors sent unto Wyat.

Sir Edward Hastings message to Wyat. Rehearsed.

"(35) The Queenes Majestie requireth to under- "stand the true cause, wherefore you have gathered "in Armes her liege people against her, which is "the part of a Traytor, and yet in your Proclama- "tions you call your selfe a true Subject, both which "cannot stand together. I am no Traytor (quoth Wyat) and the cause why I have assembled the people, is to defend the Realme from danger of being over-runne by Strangers, which must needs follow, if the marriage take place. Why, said the Counsellors, there is no stranger yet come, either for power or number whom you need to suspect, therefore if that thing onely be the quarrell, will you that dislike the marriage, come to communication touching the cause, and the Queene is content you shall be heard. To that I yeeld, said Sir Thomas Wyat; but for my further surety, I will rather bee trusted then trust; and thereupon demanded (as some have written, saith Hollinshed) The Custody of the Tower, and her Grace within it, as also the displacing of some Counsellors about her, and to place other in their Roomes: To which the Master of the Horse replyed: Wyat, before thou shalt have thy traiterous demand granted, thou shalt die, and twentie thousand more with thee; and so these Agents departed to the Court, and Wyat forth-with came unto Deepeford by Greenewich.

Sir Thomas Wyats answer.

February 1.

(36) At whose approach so neere London, such feares were possessed, that besides those in the Court (who instigated the Queene to remoove into the Tower) the Lord Major, Aldermen, and most of the Citizens were in Armour, and the Sergeants and Lawyers at Westminster Hall pleaded their causes in Harneste, at which time it was no need to bid the Spanish Ambassadors be gone; who no more standing to woo for their Master, made away by water as fast as they could: and yet some comfort was conceived by the certaine newes of the discomfiture of the Carewes and Gibs, that were making head in the West, now wholly defeated, and fled: which was proclaimed in London upon Candlemas Eve: upon the day of that Feast Queene Mary to make the City sure on her side, came unto the Guild hall, accompanied with many Courtiers, whither likewise were assembled the Lord Major, the Aldermen, and the chiefe Citizens in their Liveries: the Queene being placed, and all men attending her pleasure, with very good grace and words well uttered, thee spake in effect as here insueth.

Great feares among the people.

The seditions in Cornwall discomfited.

Queene Maries Oration.

"(28) In my owne person I am come unto you, "to tell you that, which your selves already doe see "and know, I meane the traiterous and seditious "number of the Kentish Rebels, that are assembled "against us, and you. Their pretence (as they say) is "to resist a marriage betweene us, and the Prince of "Spaine, of all their plots, pretended quarrels, and "evill contrived Articles, you have beene made "privy. Since which time, our Councell have reser- "ted to the Rebels, demanding the cause of their "continued enterprize, by whose answers the mar- "riage is found to be the least of their quarrell: or "rather a cloake to cover their pretensed purposes "against our Religion; for, swarving from their for- "mer Articles, they now manifestly bewray the in- "ward Treason of their hearts, most arrogantly de- "manding the possession of our person, the keeping "of our Tower, and not onely the placing and dis- "placing of our Counsellors: but also to use them, "and us at their pleasures: what I am (loving Sub- "jects, you right well know) your Queene, to whom "at my Coronation, when I was wedded to the "Realme, and to the Lawes of the same (the spou- "sall ring whereof I have on my finger, which never

"misfed your alleageance, and obedience unto me.
"And that I am the right, and true inheritor to the "English Crowne, I not onely take all Christen-"dome to witnes, but also your Acts of Parliaments
"confirming the same. My Father (as you all know)
"possessed the regall estate by right of inheritance,
"which now by the same right is discended unto
"me: to him you alwayes shewed your selves both "faithfull and loving Subjects, as to your Liege
"Lord and King, and therefore I doubt not but "you will shew your selves so to me his daughter;
"which if you doe, then may you not suffer any
"rebell to usurpe the Government of our Person,
"or enterpose our estate, especially so presumptu-
"ous a Traytor as this Wyat hath shewed himselfe
"to be: who most certainly, as he hath abused our "ignorant Subjects, to be adherents to his traiterous
"quarrell; so doth he intend by the color of the same,
"to subdue the lawes to his will, and to give scope
"to the rascall and forlorne persons, to make gene"rall havocke and spoile of your goods. And this I "say further unto you in the word of a Prince, I can"not tell how naturally a Mother loveth her Chil"dren, for I was never the Mother of any; but cer"tainly if a Prince and Governour may as naturally
"love the Subjects, as the Mother doth her child,
"then assure your selves, that I being your Sove"raigne Lady, and Queene doe as earnestly and "tenderly love and favour you. And I thus loving "you, cannot but thinke, that you as heartily and "faithfully love me againe: and so this love bound "together in the knot of concord, we shall be able (I "doubt not) to give these Rebels a short and speedy "overthrow. Now as concerning my intended "marriage, you shall understand, that I entred not "into the treaty thereof, without the advice of our "privy Councell, yea, & by assent of those, to whom
"my Father committed his trust, who have so consi"dered the great commodities that may thereof en-
"sue, as they not onely have thought it very honou"rable, but also expedient, both for the Wealth of "our Realme, and also of our loving Subjects. But "as touching my selfe (I assure you) I am not so de"sirous of wedding, neither am so precisely wedded "to my will, that either for mine owne pleasure I "will chuse where I list, or else so amorous, as needs
"I must have one: for I thanke God (to whom be the "praise) I have hitherto lived a Virgin, and doubt "not but with Gods grace to be able to live so still.
"But if (as my Progenitors have done before) it "might please God that I might leave some fruit
"of my body to be your Governour, I trust you "would not onely rejoyce thereat, but also I know
"it would be to your great comfort: and certainly
"if I either did know or thinke, that this marriage "should either turne to the danger, or losse of any "of you my loving Subjects, or to the detriment of "any part of the Royal Estate of this English Realme,
"I would never consent thereunto, neither would "I ever marry whilest I lived. And in the word of a "Queene, I promise and assure you, that if it shall not "probably appeare before the Nobilitie, and Com"mons in the high Court of Parliament, that this "marriage shall be for the singular benefit and com-
"moditie of the whole Realme; that then I will ab-
"staine not onely from this marriage, but also from "any other. Wherefore good Subjects, plucke up "your hearts, and like true men stand fast with your "lawfull Prince against these Rebels, both ours and
"yours, and feare them not, for (I assure you) I doe
"not: and will leave with you my Lord Howard,
"and my Lord Treasurer, to be assistant with my "Lord Major, for the safegard of the Citie from "spoile and fackage, which is the onely scope of "this rebellious Company.

(37) The Oration ended, and the Citizens well pleased, Queene Mary with good content returned to the Court, where conferring with her Councell, shee ordained the Lord William Herbert, Earle of Pembrooke, Generall of the Field, and gave forth Proclamation, that whosoever could bring Wyat either quicke or dead, should be rewarded with an hundred pound Lands by yeare, to him and his posteritie for ever.

The Earle of Pembrooke made Lord Generall. Rich. Grafton.

(38) Wyat in Depford, and knowing what was done, with foureteene Ensignes, and foure thousand strong, upon Saturday the third of February, marched towards London, at whose approch, the White Tower having him in danger, shot off her Ordonance, but did misse their marke, some levelling too farre over, and some as much too short. His entrance into Southwarke; was peaceable, and without all resistance, though many Countrey-men were therein bestowed to with-stand his comming, who contrary to trust, joyned with the Kentish, and then to winne the hearts of the people, he presently made Proclamation, that no Souldier should take away any thing without due payment, and the parties consent: notwithstanding Winchester House soone felt the contrary, whose goods were ransacked, the Bookes in the Library cut and defaced, and not a locke left upon the doores: such spoiles insurrections ever aime at, how faire soever they soyle the glasse to the sight.

Stow hath but five Ensignes, and two thousand footsouldiers.

(39) The Suburbs thus his, hee assured himselfe the City likewise shortly would be, but comming to the Bridge, he found the Gates fast shut, neither any in hast to open them for him, therefore making a trench at the Bridge-foote, planted two Peeces of Ordonance against the Gate: At S. Georges Church he mounted another, the fourth at the entrance into Barmondsey-street, and the fift towards the Bishop of Winchesters House.

(40) Within the Citie the Lord Major, and Lord William Howard caused the draw-bridge to be cut downe, and making fortifications for their defence, placed great Ordonance against the entrance. Wyat still thirsting to know the Cities intent, got with some few followers through the Porters lodge unto the draw-bridge, where being unseene himselfe, saw the passage too difficult to have friendly accesse, and thereupon said to his consorts, This place is too hot for us. Besides, the Tower began to be topped with Ordonance, seven Culverings and Demy Cannons levelled against the Bridge-foote, the Steeples of Saint Olives, and Saint Mary Overies; all the White Tower laden with her Peeces, three Fawconers over the water-Gate, and a double Culvering upon Divelling Tower: and all these were turned, and fearefully charged upon the Borough of Southwarke, which seene, the Inhabitants with great lamentations came unto Wyat, and complained, that for his cause they were like to be utterly undone, who strucken with pitty and remorse of so many, presently removed his Army towards Kingston upon Thames, where finding the Bridge broken downe, with Ladders, and Planks he soone repaired it, and so passing the River the same night, came to Braineford before he was descried by the Queenes Scoutes, the newes whereof fore troubled the Court. Wyats hopes were to have surprised the Citie upon the sudden, and therefore made such haste as he did, but being hindred by a Peece of great Ordonance, that was dismounted from the carriage, came not unto Knightsbridge before it was day.

(42) From

John Stow.

(42) From the higher ground, and along the high way, the great Ordonance played, and Wyats againe answered the like, through with small hurt to either, onely one from the Hill slew three of Wyats men in a ranke, and strucke through the Bricke-wall into the Parke. Wyat passing forward by the battell of Footmen, without any impeachment, came to Charing-Crosse, where the Lord Chamberlaine, and Sir John Gage, stood ready to resist him: but the Kentish Souldiers rushing violently into the streets, forced them into the gates of White-Hall, which presently were shut, and a repore in the Court that the Lord Generall was revolted to Wyat; all so distracted, that none durst trust others, and no other voice therein heard, but Treason, Treason. Meane while Wyat, with such small company as he had, hasted through Fleet-street, and came unto Ludgate, where he knocked to have entrance, and well hoped of further assistance, but was farre deceived, the gate being guarded against him, with a number of true Citizens, and Bands of the Queenes friends.

The conflict at Charing-Crosse.

(43) But those straglers that had taken into Westminster, whereof Knevet was Captaine, seeking to recover their companions, came before the Court gates, and there made their stand, which being shut against them, shot many of their arrowes into the Garden, yea, and into the windowes of White-hall, though without any hurt: from the Court thus guarded against them, they forthwith departed, meaning to follow Wyat their Leader into London, and marching forward, were met with at Charing-Crosse, by Sir Henry Iernyngham, Captaine of the Guard, Sir Edward Bray Master of the Ordonance, and Sir Philip Paris Knights, sent thither by order of the Lord Generall, with a band of Archers, and certaine Field Peeces to secure the Court; their Artillery discharged, they presently joyne fight with the Rebels at push of the Pike, who a while stucke to it manfully; in which conflict was the triall of the day: but as their quarrell was trayterous, so their hearts were soone quelled, each one saving himselfe by flight, wherein about twentie of those bemired Souldiers were slaine, and no other cry heard, but downe with the Draggle-tailes.

John Stow.

(44) Wyat, returned from Ludgate, sate downe upon a ftall against the common Inne called Belsavage, where he began (as it should seeme) to expostulate what his heady rashnesse had done, and the vaine hopes he had conceived of the Citizens abetments, who seldome take part against the Crowne: he then despairing of further successe, retired backe towards the Court, and was not stayed untill hee came to Temple-Barre, where certaine Horsemen comming from the Field, met him full in the face, betwixt whom began some bickering, till lastly Clarentine, King at Armes, came to him, and said; Master Wyat you see the day is gone against you, and in resisting you can doe no good, but hazard the lives of your Souldiers, and your selfe, to the great perill of your soule. My counsell is, that you were best to yeeld, and perchance you may finde the Queene mercifull, if you stay from further bloudshed.

Wyat yeeldeth himselfe.

February the 8.

(45) Wyat hereat somewhat astonied, seeing now his whole designes defeated (though his few Souldiers were bent still to fight) answered the Herauld, Well then, If I must needs yeeld, I will yeeld to a Gentleman: to whom Sir Maurice Barkley came presently, and bade him mount his Horse behind, in like manner another tooke up Sir Thomas Cobham, and the third Thomas Knevet, and so carried them unto the Court, whence in the afternoone, they with the two Mantels, and Alexander Bret, were committed to the Tower, Sir Thomas Wyat wearing a shirt of Malle under a Velvet Cassocke, and the wind-lace of his Dagge hanging about his necke. The next day eleven Gentlemen more, of name and account, were likewise committed to the Tower. In London about fifty persons were hanged for Wyats conspiracie, and foure hundred more led thorow the Citie with halters about their neckes to Westminster, where in the Tilt-yard they were all pardoned by the Queene, pronouncing her mercy from the Gallery above.

Hollinshead. March 15.

(46) But the Capitall offender Sir Thomas Wyat arraigned at Westminster upon case of high Treason, confessed the inditement, and had judgement of death accordingly, which he suffered upon the Scaffold on Tower-hill, the eleventh of April following, his words to the people were these; "Good peo"ple, I am come hither presently to die, being there-
"to lawfully and worthily condemned, for I have
"fore offended against God and the Queenes Maje"stie; I trust God hath forgiven me, and will take "mercy upon me; I beseech the Queenes Majestie
"also of forgivenesse (shee hath forgiven you quoth
"Doctor Weston) let every man beware how he ta-
"keth any thing in hand against the higher Powers,
"unlesse God be prosperable to his purpose; it will "never take good effect or successe, whereof, you "may now learne by me, and I pray God I may be "the last example in this place. But where it is said,
"and noysed abroad, that I should accuse the Lady
"Elizabeth and the Lord Courtney, it is not so, good "people: For I assure you, neither they, nor any o"ther now yonder in hold, was privy to my rising
"before I began, as I have declared no lesse to the "Queenes Councell, and that is most true. Then said Doctor Weston, marke here my masters, he saith that, that which he hath shewed to the Councell in writing of them, is most true. Whereupon Wyat put off his Gowne, his doublet, and wast-coate, and knitting a kerchiefe over his eyes, with most fervent prayers, received the stroke of the Axe.

Wyats words at his death.

(47) Alexander Bret, and twencie two Kentish persons besides, were executed in divers parts of that County: others were likewise arraigned for the same Conspiracie, as Sir Nicholas Throckmorton, and Sir Iames Croft, the one quit by his Inquest, the other pardoned of life by the Queene. Many others were suspected as ayders unto Wyat, and his enterprise, among whom the Lord Courtney, and the Princesse Elizabeth, sister to the Queene, were not the least, and therefore both of them committed to the Tower: of which Ladies troubles, innocency; and truth, thus we find related.

Sir Nicholas Throckmorton and Sir Iames Croft arraigned.

Ladyelizabeths troubles.

(48) These Virgin Princes were not so neerely linked in bloud and nature, as they were separated asunder in affecting Religion, and that being the prime cause for which these commotions were raised, Queene Mary much suspected her sister to be a principall mover therein. The jealousie whereof, Gardiner of Winchester did further inflame, by blowing Conjectures into her eare: so that needs the Princesse must be sent for, then lying sicke at her Mannor of Asbridge, even the next day after that Wyat rose. The messengers were, Sir Iohn Williams, Sir Edward Hastings, and Sir Thomas Cornwallis, all three Privy Counsellors, with a troope of Horsemen, in number two hundred and fiftie.

M. Fox A&. and Monuments. 1288.

(49) These comming to Asbridge at ten in the night, suddenly ascended into her Privy Chamber, and making it knowne they came from the Queene, had present accesse into her Bed-Chamber; where the said Lady lay very sore sicke: their first salutations were, that they were sorry to see her in that estate, and I am not glad, said shee, to see you here at this time of the night; Madam, quoth they, our Message requires hast, and the Queenes pleasure is, that you shal be at London the seventh of this moneth. No Creature gladder to come to her Majestie then I (said Lady Elizabeth) being right sorry that I am not in case at this time to attend her Grace, as your selves here see. Indeed (said they) for that we see, we are heartily sorry, but our commission is, that wee bring you to London either quicke or dead, whereat shee being greatly amazed, sorrowfully said, shee well hoped their commission was nothing so strait, but they calling for two Doctors of Physicke, demanded whether shee might be remooved with life, and that being resolved, bade her prepare against the next morning, and so left this innocent Princesse very sore perplexed the rest of the night.

Lady Elizabeth as a Prisoner conveyed to the Court.

(50) The next morning approached, and she in no better plight, notwithstanding, was led forth more like a Prisoner than a Princesse, which the people in every place as shee passed, did much lament, and strongly guarded, was so conveyed unto the Court, where for foureteene dayes space, shee comfortlesse continued without sight of friend, the Queene, or any Lords: those onely excepted that attended the dores, which were the Lord Chamberlaine, and Sir Iohn Gage.

Princesse Elizabeth examined of treason.

(51) Vpon Friday before Palme Sunday, Gardiner of Winchester, and nine more of the Councell came into her presence, and there charged her both with Wyats Conspiracy, and the stirres lately made in the West parts, by Sir Peter Carew, and others, which shee most constantly denyed: but in conclusion, they told her it was the Queenes pleasure, that shee should forth-with goe to the Tower, the name of which dolefull prison, strucke deepe to her heart. I trust (said shee) her Majesty will be farre more gracious, then to commit to that place a true and most innocent woman, that never hath offended her in thought, word, nor deed. And thereupon instantly defired those Lords to be a meane for her unto the Queene: which some of them promised, and much pitried her case. But about an houre after, came foure of these Lords againe, namely, Winchester, the Treasurer, the Steward, and Sussex: with a charge to discharge her of all attendants, saving onely her Gentleman Vsher, three Gentlewomen, and two Groomes of her Chamber, the Guard was set to Ward in the next roomes; two Lords with Bands of men to watch in the Hall, and two hundred Northerne white Coates in the Garden, thus all was made sure, and shee kept from starting.

The honorable parts of the Earle of Sussex.

(52) The next day came unto her two Lords of the Councell, with commandement from the Queene to have her to the Tower, they roundly told her, her Barge was prepared, and that the Tide would tarry for no body: this heavy newes encreased this distressed Ladies pensivenesse, who in most humble wise became Petitioner unto their Lordships, that shee might stay untill the next Tide, which as shee well hoped, would prove more comfortable; but the one of them being more forward in his Commission then the other, flatly told her, that neither Tide nor time should bee delayed. Whereupon her Grace desired thee might write to the Queene: hee againe answered, that he durst not suffer it, neither in his judgement was it convenient: but the other more milder (which was the Earle of Sussex) kneeling downe, told her, that her Grace should have libertie to write her minde: sweating as he was a true man, himselfe would deliver it into the Queenes hand, and bring her the answer, whatsoever came of it: which honourable permission was then most thankfully taken, and afterward most highly esteemed in her Princely favours towards that honourable man; but in writing this Letter, or Petition to the Queene, the Tide was turned, and served not to shoot the Bridge with a Barge; therefore it was privily determined, to take the advantage of the next, which with better advisement was againe deferred, for that it fell about midnight, whence rose a feare, that shee might be forceably taken from them before shee came to the Tower: and so with great providence was that danger prevented.

Lady Elizabeth carried prisoner unto the Tower.

(53) The next day being Palme Sunday, served well for their purpose, when as under pretext of devotion, the Citizens of London were commanded to carry their Palmes to the Church, whilest her Barge might be passed by without sight, or any suspect. And to that purpose, the foresaid two Noblemen, about nine of the Clocke repaired unto her, shewing that the time was now come, that her Grace must goe to the Tower; to which shee answered, the Lords will be done, I am contented: seeing it is the Queenes minde: and comming into the Garden to take Barge, shee cast her eyes towards every Window, hoping to see some that would pitty her case, but that also failing, shee sighed, and said; I marvell what the Nobilitie meane, to suffer me a Prince to be led into Captivitie, the Lord knowes whither, for my selfe doe not.

The severe and hard dealings against the Princesse Elizabeth.

(54) Great haste was made to the Barge, and as much to get by London unseene: but the Tyde yong, and not fully come in, the fall of the water at the Bridge was so great, as the Bargemen themselves feared to passe thereunder, and motioned a stay till the streame were more levell, which in no wise would be heard: whereupon they passed the Arch with such danger, as the Sterne of the Boate strucke against the ground; and come to the staires, could not take land without stepping into the water, which this tender, and newly recovered Princesse was forced to doe, in which passage the uttered these words: I speake before thee, O God, having none other friend but thee onely; here landeth as true a Subject, being prisoner as ever landed at these staires; to which the severall Lords answered, if it were so, it was the better for her. Shee coming into the gate, a great number of Servants and Warders of the Tower stood to guard her, through whom as shee passed, the poore men kneeling downe, with one voyce, desired God to preserve her Grace, whereof some were rebuked, and others put from their Ordinary the next day.

The constant patience of Lady Elizabeth.

(55) Then passing somewhat further, both faint and uncomfortable, shee rested her selfe upon a cold stone, to whom Master Bridges, the Lieutenant then being, said; Madam, you were best to come out of the raine, for you sit unwholsomely; to whom shee replyed, Better sit here, then in a worse place; for God knoweth, and not I, whether you will bring me: At which her sorrowfull and dejected answer, her Gentleman Vsher, a servant most loyall and loving to his Mistresse, among many others brake forth into flouds of teares, (the witnesses commonly of all inward griefe) which the Princesse perceiving, reproved, demanding what he meant, so to discourage her, seeing she tooke him to be her Comforter, and especially knowing her truth to be such, as that no man should have any cause to weepe for her.

A child suspected and forbidden to visite the Lady Elizabeth.

(56) Shee safely bestowed, and the dores made fast with lockes and bolts, was there comfortlesse left in the dolefull prison, where calling for her booke, and her few servants about her, shee fell unto prayers, desiring God to prosper her worke, that she might build upon the rocke Christ: whereby these blustering tempests thus suddenly risen, might not prevaile against her foundation. Meane while the Lords were as circumspect, how she might be kept sure; many among them propounded, that it was most needfull shee should be close prisoner, and a strong guard set to watch her doore; against which the Lord Sussex replyed, and said: My Lords, let us take heede we goe not beyond our Commission, shee was our Kings Daughter, and is (we know) the Prince next in blood, therefore let us so deale with her now, that if it so happen, wee may answer our doings unto her another day.

The Earle of Sussex most firme for Lady Elizabeth.

(57) Two dayes spent thus in the Tower, and Gods divine service celebrated in English, it was commanded to have Masse in her lodgings; and to that end two of her Yeomen were appointed to answer the Priest, which was as unwillingly done, as the devotion was small. Then were the favourites examined, yea, and * some of them with torture, and all to finde a fit knife to cut her innocent throat, that so Winchester might wash his white Rochet in her purple bloud; who being Lord Chancellor, and Ruler of the rest, came into the Tower to examine her himselfe, with some others of the Queenes Councell: Shee then brought before them, was demanded

ded of the talke shee had with Sir Iames Croft (a prisoner in the Tower, and then brought to her Presence) concerning her removing from Ashridge unto Dunnington Castle: My Lords (said shee) mee thinks you doe me wrong to examine every meane Prisoner against me, if they have done evill let them answer for it, I pray you joyne mee not with such offenders; as touching my remoove to Dunnington, mine officers, and you (Sir Iames Croft) can tell; but what is this to the purpose, might I not, my Lords, goe to mine owne houses at all times? whereunto the Lord of Arundell kneeling downe, answered that her Grace said truth, and that himselfe was sorry to see her troubled about such vaine matters: Well my Lords (said shee) you sift mee narrowly, but you can doe no more then God hath appointed, unto whom I pray to forgive you all.

Liberte obtained to walke in the Garden.

(58) No fault appearing, nor offence found, yet was shee still retained in that close and sorrowfull prison, and for want of fresh aire, her health began to be empaired; whereupon the Lord Shandoys one of hers Keepers, obtained that shee might walke into the Queenes lodgings, the windowes being shut onely in presence of himselfe, the Lord Chamberlaine, and three of the Queenes Gentlewomen sent her for the same purpose; which favour was further increased by liberty to walke into the Garden, the other prisoners commanded not so much as to looke into the place while her Grace remained therein.

M. Fox. Acts and Mon. 2394.

(59) During which time there usually repaired unto her a little Boy, about foure yeares of age (a mans sonne of the Tower) in whose pretty prattling shee tooke great pleasure; his use was to bring her flowers, and to receive at her hands such things as commonly please Children: which lastly brought a great suspition into the Lord Chamberlaines working head, that by this Child letters were brought betwixt the Princes Elizabeth, and the Lord Courtney, whereupon the Boy was threatned, and his Father commanded not to suffer him any more to resort to her Grace: which notwithstanding, the next day he did, but the doore being shut, and hee peeping thorow a hole, cried unto her, Mistresse I can bring you no more flowers now.

A Warrant signed to execute Lady Elizabeth.

(60) It was reported (saith Fox) if the relation be true, that a Writ subscribed under certaine Councellors hands, was directed for the present death of the Lady Elizabeth, which he doth wholly impute unto Winchesters vvorking: This sudden charge given for her present execution, sore grieved Master Bridges then Lieutenant of the Tovver, vvho forthvvith repaired unto the Queene, to knovv her further pleasure therein: but these being altogether ignorant of any such vvarrant, blamed the doers and gave a contrary command, vvhereby vvas preserved the life of her sister: vvhich hovvsoever (to the distasture of her enemies) it vvas prolonged, yet her State of lives securitie seemed little better, and her fears presently conceived, vvere nothing the lesse: for the Constable discharged, Sir Henry Bemnifield a more severe Iaylor vvas placed in his roome, vvho vvith an hundred Souldiers in blevv coates entred upon his charge: at sight vvherefof the fearefull Princesse demanded, vvhether the Scaffold vvhereon Lady Iane suffered vvas still standing: or vvhether Sir Henry (a man to her altogether unknovvne) made any conscience of murther, if hers vvas committed unto his charge.

Sir Henry Bemnifield his severities and Stery.

Lady Elizabeth commanded to have Masse in her lodgings.

Lady Elizabeth is removed to Woodstocke.

(61) The nineteenth of May her Grace vvas remooved from the Tovver tovvards Woodstocke, Sir Henry Benifield being her conductor, unto vvhom Sir Iohn Williams Lord Tame vvas joyned in Commission. The first night shee vvas brought unto Richmond, vvhere all her ovvne servants vvere removed from her presence, and the rascall Souldiers set to attend her person; by vvhich severe beginnings, shee much doubted that her dayes vvere neere spent, and in that place her life must take end: vvhereupon calling together her servants, desired them to pray for her; for this night (said shee) I thinke I must die; which lamentable words drew fountaines of teares out of their eyes; and thereupon her Gentleman Vsher went downe unto the Lord Tame in the Court, desiring him unfainedly to shew, whether his Lady and Mistresse that night were in danger of death, whereby himselfe and fellowes might take such part as God would appoint. Marry God forbid, quoth the Lord Tame, that any such wickednesse should bee intended, which rather then it should bee wrought, I, and my men will die at her foote.

The great fesre of Lady Elizabeth.

(62) With no greater comfort proceeded shee towards Woodstocke: Sir Henry her Iaylor (as shee termed him) ever carrying so hard a hand in his Commission; that the people who with teares presfed to meet her in the passage, and with prayers saluted her in most loving manner, he both threatned, and drave backe, calling them Traytors, and Rebels against the Queene, and her Lawes; and whereas in certaine Villages Bels were rung as shee passed for joy (as they conceived) of her deliverance, Sir Henry Bemnifield tooke the matter so distastfull, that he commanded the Bels to surcease, and set the ringers thereof in the stockes; so that not without cause this loving Lady sent this word unto her poore servants, and well-wishing friends, Tanquam ovis, as a sheepe to the slaughter, so am I led: And surely had not the Lord Tame beene more comfortable in his place unto this distressed Princesse, her spirit of hopes had beene spent before the conduction of her person had beene accomplished.

The joy that the People conceived of Lady Elizabeths deliverance.

(63) Neither in Woodstocke was her liberty much enlarged, nor feares any lesse, shee being inclosed in none of the best lodgings, guarded with Souldiers both day, and night; and although shee had leave into some Gardens, yet were five or sixe lockes betwixt her walke, and her lodgings, and all made fast after her entrance. It was also suspected that the Keeper of Woodstocke, a notorious Ruffian, was instigated to kill this innocent Princesse, as also that one Basset a Darling of Bishop Gardiners, came to Bladenbridge, a mile from Woodstocke, accompanied with twentie men in privy Coates, earnestly desiring to speake with Lady Elizabeth, pretending secret and importunate businesse: but Sir Henry her Keeper gone to the Court, had given straight charge to his brother, that none should have accesse unto her before his returne, though they came from the Councell, or Queene her selfe. Whereby that designe was happily lost. What his errand was, I will not determine, but others have conceived it was for no good.

Lady Elizabeth in danger to be murthered.

Elizabeths lodgings on fire.

(64) Another accident also hapned, whether of purpose, or otherwise, I cannot say; but surely it was to the danger of her life: for on the sudden her lodgings were on fire, which began to kindle betwixt the boards, and seeling under the Chamber where shee lay, and was vehemently mistrusted to be purposely done. These and the like feares daily happening, drew the distressed Princesse into many passions, whereof one is reported, that shee sitting solitary at her Prison window, chanced to see a Maide of Woodstocke in the Parke milking of Kine, and as shee sate, merrily to sing over her Pale, which strucke this sad pensive Prisoner into a deepe meditation, preferring the Maides fortunes farre above her owne, and heartily wished that her selfe were a Milke-maide, into such distresse was her Princely birth brought, in which comfortlesse thraldome, we will a while leave her, and returne to speake of matters in the Court.

(65) Queene Mary being now chiefe Pilot her selfe, and set at the helme, of all Soveraigne power, steered the Sterne of her zealous affections; according to her owne liking; when presently upon her Coronation began a Parliament at Westminster; and a Convocation in the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paules in London; where shee commanded a free disputation for Religion; without any danger of offence fence. The Questions to bee controversed, were concerning a Catechisme set forth in King Edwards dayes, and the presence of Christ in the Sacrament of his Supper. For Popish Transubstantiation stood Disputers Doctor Moreman, Doctor Watson, Doctor Chedsey, Master Harpsfield, and Master Morgan, Doctor Weston Deane of Westminster appointed for Prolocutor: For Christs spirituall presence were M. Haddon. M. Elmar, M. Cheyney, M. Philpot, and Master Perne, these meeting sixe severall daies disputed only upon the last question: but with such disagreement, as lastly Queene Mary commanded Boner to dissolve the assembly, without any Subscriptions to the assertions premised.

A disputation for Religion.

(66) And not long after Thomas Cranmer Archbishop of Canterbury, Nicholas Ridley Bishop of London, and Hugh Latimer sometimes Bishop of Worcester, were sent from the Tower of London unto Oxford to dispute upon the said Argument against Doctor Tresham, Doctor Cole, Doctor Oglethorpe, Doctor Rie, Master Harpsfield, and Master Pecknam, all Oxford men, unto whom from Cambridge were joyned Doctor Tonge, Doctor Glinne, Doctor Seton, Doctor Watson, Doctor Sedgewicke, and Doctor Atkinson, Doctor Weston againe being Prolocutor: the disputation began upon the sixteenth of Aprill, and ended the twentieth of the same moneth, with the sentence of those three Bishops deaths, which through fire gave testimony of their faiths, a yeare and sixe moneths after in the Towne Ditch of Oxford: whose disputations, letters, and last ends, are largely set downe by M. Iohn Fox in his Acts and Monuments of the Church, unto whom I referre the desirous Reader, lest by enlarging of them, the course of our temporall story should be overmuch interrupted with matters Ecclesiasticall, of those sorrowfull times.

Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer sent unto Oxford.

An. Dom. 1554.

(67) Queene Mary intending her marriage with Spaine, great feares were conceived that many calamities would follow, aswell to the Church, reformed from abuses, as for the politicke proceedings of the Kingdomes affaires; which as some tooke was prognosticated even from heaven it selfe, by a Raine-bow reversed, the bow turned downward, and the two ends standing upward, as also by two Sunnes shining at one time, and a good distance asunder in the Skies, both which sights appeared in London the fifteenth of February.

They are burned.

M. Fox in Acts & Mon. p. 1637

(68) In which Citie a Parliament to that purpose was assembled, wherein by Statute the marriage was confirmed, though with no lesse liking of those times observers, then was the marriage desired which is fained of the Sunne: to hinder whose purpose, the world is said to have made suite unto Iupiter, lest having more Sunnes then one, the whole frame of the Globe should bee set on fire. These distastive stomackes Queene Mary well perceived, therefore to give them content, shee wrote her Letters into the West, and to Wales, charging the Lord President, the Bishops of Oxford and Salisbury, to intimate the benefit thereof to the whole Land, as much as might be, neither was London forgotten, whose Lord Major and Commons were sent for to the Court, and there by the Lord Chancellor told how by this match all the Realme would be enriched, but especially London by their trade and traffick with Spaine.

(69) Vnto Spaine were sent the Earle of Bedford, and the Lord Fitzwaters to conduct King Philip into England; the Lord Admirall with twenty eight ships securing the Seas the space of three moneths before: all things thus ordered, and Philip in a readinesse tooke Barke at Corona in Galacia, and with a Navie of an hundred and fiftie saile directed his course for his Queene.

(70) Vpon Friday the twentieth of Iuly, hee arrived at Southampton, and was the first man of that Fleet that set foot on the shore, which no sooner done, but he drew his Sword, and so bare it naked in his hand as he went. The Earle of Arundell Lord Steward of the Queenes house, presented to his Highnesse the George and Garter, and the Major of Southampton the Keyes of the Towne: thither was sent the Lord Chancellor from the Queene, and hee againe sent of his Nobles unto her, who was on the way unto Winchester, to welcome him herselfe: towards which City upon Munday following, he set forth, being accompanied with the Marquesse of Winchester, the Earles of Arundell, Darby, Worchester, Bedford, Rutland, Pembroke, and Surrey, the Lords Clinton, Cobham, Willoughby, Darcy, Matrevers, Talbot, Strange, Fitzwaren, and North: besides many Knights and gallant Gentlemen. His Spanish traine were the Dukes of Alva, an Medina Cœli, the Admirall of Castilla, the Marquesses of Burgues, Piscara, Sarria, Valli, Aguillar, the Earles of Egmund, Horne, Feria, Chinchon, Olivares, Saldana, Modica, Eventesalida, Landriano, Castellar, the Bishop of Cuenca, and others: so that more honourable attendants had seldome beene seene.

The honourable traines of the two Princes.

(71) And surely the Covenants were as honourable for England that were agreed upon betwixt them, which were branched into tenne Propositions.

1 First was, that Philip should bee stiled King of England during the Matrimony, and should assist his Queene in government, but not dispose of any Lands, Offices, Benefices, or Revenues in the Realme.

2 That Mary by vertue of this marriage, should be admitted Queene of the Realmes and Dominions of Spaine already possessed, as of all others, that were appropriated unto the same, during the Matrimony.

3 That for Dowry shee should receive yearely threescore thousand pound Flemish, if in case she over-lived King Philip her husband.

4 That the Issue proceeding of this marriage either male or female in the right of their mothers inheritance, in the Kingdomes either of England, or other Dominions depending, should succeed in them according to the Lawes, Statutes, and Customes of the same.

5 That if it chanced Charles Duke of Austrich, the Infant of Spaine to die without Issue, then the eldest sonne of this Matrimony should succeed in all the Dukedomes, Earledomes, Dominions and Patrimoniall lands belonging unto Charles the Emperour, father to the Prince of Spaine aswell in Burgoigne as in the Low Countries, in the Dukedomes of Brabant, Luxenburgh, Gelderland, Zutphane, Freesland, in the Countries of Flanders, Artois, Holland, Zeeland, Namure, and the land beyond the Iles.

6 That the Dominions of the Low Country, and of Burgundy should be excluded from the Patrimoniall descent of the said Lord Charles, notwithstanding his Issue remained, and should be enjoyed by the eldest borne of this marriage without further claime to any other Dominions belonging unto Spaine: and the rest of the Children thereof proceeding, to have convenient portions and Dowry assigned them aswell out of those Countries, as out of England and the others adjoyned.

7 That if no issue male were borne of this marriage, then the Eldest female should possesse those Dominions, provided that shee should marry a Nobleman, either of the Low Country or of the Realme of England, otherwise the right of the Succession should remaine in the Lord Charles, yet not so cut off, but that shee with the other daughters begot in this marriage, should bee endowed of their fathers Lands and possessions, aswell in Spaine as in the Low Countries.

8 That for want of Issue by the Lord Charles, and of heire male procreated by this marriage, in that case the eldest daughter of King Philip and Queene Mary should succeed both in the Territories of the Low Countries, as also in the Realmes of England, Spaine, Spaine, and the rest, after the nature, lawes and customes of the same.

9 That who so succeeded, either he, or shee, yet should the severall Dominions be governed by the Natives borne in the Realmes, wholly and intirely after the priviledges, rites and accustomed manner formerly used.

10 That a sincere fraternitie, unitie and peace; should bee confirmed for ever betwixt these Nations, so as they should mutually aide each other in all things, according to the strength, forme and effect treated of at Westminster, and subscribed unto at Vtericke.

(72) As these were agreed upon for the Generall, so other particulars were articuled with the King himselfe, which were as followeth.

1 That he should not bestow the administration of offices or benefices in the Realme of England, to any stranger or person not borne unto the English subjection.

2 That his Court should bee replenished with Gentlemen and Yeomen the Natives of the Land.

3 That hee should make no invasion of state against the Lawes and Customes of the Realme, neither violate the Priviledges thereto belonging.

4 That hee should not carry the Queene out of her owne Dominions, without her speciall desire, nor none of her Children without consent of her Nobilitie.

5 That if shee should die issuelesse, hee should Challenge no right in the Kingdome, but should suffer the succession to come to her next.

6 That he should not carry or suffer to be carried out of the Realme, either Iewels, or other things of especiall estimation, but should faithfully keepe them for the profit of the English Crowne.

7 That hee should not suffer any ships, gunnes, Ordonance and other munition of warre to bee conveied out of the Realme, but should see all the Forts and Frontiers of the Land kept, and the same sufficiently stored for their defence.

8 That neither directly nor indirectly, the Realme of England should bee intangled with the warres of his Father, and the French King, neither that himselfe should give any cause for the breach of peace betwixt the two Realmes.

Philip and Mary married at Winchester An. Dom. 1554.

(73) Things thus ordered, with consent of all parties, the marriage with great state was solemnized at Winchester, upon Wednesday being the 25. of Iuly and Saint Iames day, where the Emperours Embassadors presently pronounced, that in consideration of this marriage, their master had given unto his sonne Philip, the Kingdomes of Naples and Ierusalem, whereupon their Titles by Garter King at Armes, was solemnely proclaimed with these stiles as followeth.

The large stile of King Philip and Queene Mary.

Philip and Mary by the Grace of God, King and Queene of England, France, Naples, Ierusalem, and Ireland, Defendor of the Faith, Princes of Spaine and Cecil, Archdukes of Austrich, Dukes of Millan, Burgundy and Brabant, Counts of Hapsburge, Flanders and Tyroll.

Philip and Mary in great estate passe through London.

(74) And according to the stiles, so was the Majestie of their proceedings, having two Swords borne before them as they went from the Church; with other Emperiall Ensignes of their great Magnificence; which nothing was lessened in their passage through London; where English eyes beheld Philip, after the affections of their owne hearts, some rejoycing as Israel, that Ieroboams golden calves should be againe erected, and some sorrowing as Iudah, that the Brasen Serpent was not broken, all of them assured, that this Salomons sufferance, and his wiveszeale, would build againe the Altars that had beene cast downe.

1. King. 11.

(75) The experience whereof Queene Mary her selfe had given, even before shee was crowned, in causing the Latine Service againe to be said, in displacing the reformed Bishops, and in publishing a most straight prohibition against preaching, and printed English Bookes: to all which some-time serving Church-men gave their consents, scandalizing not onely the lives of the Ministers, but also the Scriptures translation, and the just proceedings of King Edwards time; against all which, Master Bourn in a publike Sermon made at Pauls-Crosse (in the presence of the Lord Major and Bonner his Master) so liberally inveighed, as that one of his Auditors with more distaste then discretion, and more zeale then Religion, threw a Dagger at him to his great danger, and no lesse feare, and such threats murmured against him by the people his auditory, as had not Master Bradford stepped up in his roome, and perswaded them unto quietnesse, it had surely cost the Preacher his life, which caused the Crosse the next Sabbath to be guarded by the Queenes Guard whilst the Preacher continued in the pulpit.

A dagger throwne at the Preacher.

(76) And against the like offence was conceived against Doctor Pendleton, who in the next yeare after, and in the same place had a gunne desperatly discharged against him: unto such harred their Doctrine did drive them, and unto such sinne the overfervent affectioned lay many times exposed: And no lesse was that Diabolicall device of certaine gidly reformers, who had taught a Maide so to speake in a wall, as her hearers beleeved it was the voice of an Angell, being none other, but most seditious speeches against the Queenes proceedings, the Prince of Spaine, the Masse, and Confession. In mockage whereof also a Cat was hanged on a gallowes neere unto the Crosse in Cheape, her head shorne, and wearing a vesture fashioned like unto a Cope, her fore-feet tyed with a round paper betwixt, like unto the papisticall consecrated bread; and in that manner the eighth of Aprill was shewed by the Preacher at Pauls-Crosse, both to the offence and content of the Spectators; and to deride the ridiculous Idolatries of the time then in use, upon Easter day the same yeare, and in the same Cheape, as the Priest of Saint Pancrasse came to celebrate the resurrection, and after the accustomed manner put his hand into the Sepulcher for the Crucifix (there in purposely bestowed) when he used the words of the Evangelist very devoutly: Surrexit non est hic, He is risen and not heere: found it so indeed, for that his God was gotten away, and could never after be found.

(77) These things (saith Fox) caused both the Queene, and Bishops, to conceive an evill opinion of the Londoners; as too much favouring of King Edwards Reformation, for which cause Bonner commanded all Scriptures, printings upon their Churches walles to bee blotted out; and many other injunctions to be inquired after. But from these vaine trifles let us returne to more serious matters in the ensuing History.

M. Fox Act. and Monuments.

(78) Queene Mary erecting the Masse, and leaving the title of Supremacy to the Pope, sent for her kinsman Cardinall Poole to bee her director in those great businesses, who had beene a long time in forraigne parts, and ever a favorite unto the See of Rome, whose life untill this time, we will briefly run over, so many dependances of story relying upon him.

The life and story of Cardinall Poole.

(79) Hee was the sonne of Margaret Countesse of Salisbury, the second child, and only daughter of George Duke of Clarence, second brother unto King Edward the fourth: whose youth was spent in literature at Magdalen Colledge in Oxford; and state increased by King Henry his kinsman, in bestowing upon him the Deanery of Exceter. Then travelled he into Italy, and at Padua studied seven yeares, in which time the King having abolished the Pope, he was sent for into England, but refusing to returne, Poole made Cardinall.

was proclaimed Traitor, and his Deanery given to another: which his losse was presently repaied by his holy Father, in making him Cardinall, and imploying him in many Ambassages, both to the Emperour, and French King, with whom he ever dealt against King Henry, and solicited others by letters to forsake his friendship and obedience, which his doing brought many into danger, and for which lastly his owne mother lost her Head.

(78) Then was he made Legate of Viterbion, where he determined to have led a more quiet life: but Pope Paul the third summoning the obtruded Councell of Trent, appointed Poole with two others to be his Vicegerents: Though indeed this Cardinall was none of the forwardest in the matter of justification, unto whose opinion therein he drew one Morrel a learned Spaniard, who of purpose was sent to dispute the Popes Doctrine in that Councell.

Poole elected Pope. Goodman. lives of Bishops.

(79) But this Holy Father leaving his Chaire emptie by death, a faction fell among the Electors, some for the French, and some for the Emperour, which last light upon Poole, and choose him for Pope. He altogether Imperiall, desired a more orderly Election supposing himselfe so gracious in the eyes of most, that the same would be continued to his greater praise.

(80) But the French faction working upon the advantage, put the rest in minde of the Emperials sacking of Rome, the imprisonment, and jests that were made of the Pope, the absence of many Cardinals Electors, whose voyces they knew not, yea, and Cardinall Caraffa alleadged particular exceptions against Poole the elected, changing him (as Pasquill likewise did) with incontinency of body, as also of Heresie, for arguing upon a justifying faith in the Councell of Trent, for frequenting company with Anthonie Flaminius a knowne Protestant, and since he was Legate, that he never had punished that doctrine with death.

Poole accused by Cardinall Caraffa.

(81) But these accusations, were rather to shrub off his faire top, that Caraffa himselfe might more eminently be seene, who thought if Poole failed, to be their fairest marke; wherein his politicke expectation was farre-over-seene. For the English Cardinall so cleered himselfe, that the French Caraffa received disgrace, and all their voices went for Poole even the same night, which hee againe seemed to dislike of, saying that his election should not bee a worke of darkenesse, and therefore willed them orderly to proceed upon the next day; such assurance had his hopes conceived, that hee thought destiny had beene inforced to set the Papall Crowne upon his Head.

Poole againe chosen Pope.

(82) But whether it were his double delay, or his neglecting to strike when the yron was hot, the Electors change their determination, and choose the Cardinall de Monte for Pope, who named himselfe Julius the third, and he to congratulate Poole for his Backwardnesse, enforced Caraffa to aske him forgivenesse before they departed the Conclave: Poole thus disappointed of the Papall Chaire, retired himselfe unto Verona, where in a Monastery of S. Bennets (which order he had assumed and was the Patron) he made his Residence, as desirous to leade a more contemplative life.

Cardinall Poole sent for by Queene Mary.

(83) But scarcely was he setled before he heard of King Edwards death, and a message sent from Queene Mary (who had beene brought up under the Countesse his Mother) for his returne into England. Her affection towards him, he knew was very great both for his person, his learning, and religion, and himselfe relied much upon the old familiarity betwixt them, as also of his birth being of the bloud royall; for which causes he fore longed homeward, not doubting but if things stood as he thought, to get a dispensation, to lay off the Hat, and to put on a Crowne.

(84) But the Emperour mistrusting what this Prelate intended, found devices to hold him beyond Seas, untill the match was concluded betweene Queene Mary, and his sonne. And hitherto Cardinall Poole applauded by the Pope, began now to enter into his frowne, for being in England, and Archbishop of Canterbury: his old accuser the foresaid Caraffa had in the meane while obtained the Papacy under the name of Paul the fourth: when as presently he sent Frier Peto, whom he confecrated Bishop of Sarum, and discharged Poole of his Legative power, which doings the Queene tooke so ill, that shee forbade Peto to enter the Land, untill a reconciliation was made betwixt the Pope, and Cardinall Poole her kinsman. Which man as hath beene said, for soliciting Potent Princes against King Henry, in the quarrell of Rome, had runne in great displeasure with the English, whereby some Acts of Parliament were made against him: all which were now repealed, and Lord Reinold Poole received as an Angell of God, unto whom that honourable house presented a Petition, to be received againe into the bosome of Rome.

An. Dom. 1553.

(85) The suit easily granted, and absolution given, all things proceeded at the devotion of the Romanists. Images were commanded to be erected againe in the Churches: Holy Water, Pax, and Censures, imploid at the Celebration of their Masses and Mattens: Oyle, Creame, and Spittle, used in the Administration of the Sacrament of Baptisme. Altars furnished with Pictures, Costly Coverings, and the Crucifix thereon solemnly placed: unto whom Lights, Candles, and Tapers, with great adoration were offered, and all to captivate the senses of the zealous Beholder, in which zeale Queene Mary her selfe gave a full testimoniall, in restoring againe all Ecclesiasticall livings assumed to the Crowne, saying, that shee set more by the salvation of her owne soule, then shee did by ten Kingdomes. A worthy speech verily, and good example of a Prince, but slowly followed of many meane subjects, who in this case doe rather muzzell the mouth of the Oxe, that treadeth out their Corne, then suffer such as serve at the Altar, to live by the Altar.

The rites of Rome reduced in England.

(86) And surely so well inclined was Mary of her selfe, that had not the zeale of her religion, and the authoritie of Church-men overswayed her owne disposition, the flames of their consuming fires had not mounted so high. But woe to the procurer of those sixe Articles, (for which many had died) enacted by King Henry the eight, whose rigour in some sort himselfe had both qualified and repealed, which were againe put in practise, especially two, the one of them touching life, and the other losse of goods; which last was the separation of man and wife, the greatest offence to mutuall societie, and naturall affection, as can be committed; and that of life so Tyrannicall, as the Law it selfe may seeme with Draco to be writ in blood, and so tyrannically followed, that within the compasse of lesse then foure yeares continuance, there died no lesse for testimoniall of their conscience in this case, then two hundred seventie and seven persons without regard of degree, sexe or age.

The losse of the Queene Mary.

(87) In the heat of whose flames were consumed five Bishops, one and twentie Divines, eight Gentlemen, eightie foure Artificers, one hundred husbandmen, servants and labourers, twentie sixe wives, twentie widowes, nine Virgins, two Boyes, and two Infants, one of them whipped to death by Bishop Bonner, and the other springing out of his mothers wombe from the stake as shee burned, was by the Sergeants throwne againe into the fire: Which barbarous cruelnie, howsoever the Author of Englands three conversions, would excuse, as worthy of death; depraving the sufferers, of learning, religion, civill manners, and honesty of life; yet the more charitable of his owne ranke, and profession doe pittie the spilling of so much Christian blood: the greatest point of no greater sinne, then to beleeve Christs spirituall body, to be spiritually received in the blessed Sacrament of his Supper.

Rish. Grafton. R. Hollinsh. lib. Fox. Mart.

(86) The rigour thereof that fell from his mouth, who wished many more had so suffered, when the Sword was so drawne, is farre from the precept and sufferance of Christ, that would have even tares grow unplucke, till his harvest were in, and yet if those be his sheepe that follow his voyce, and his word sufficient to make the man of God perfect as himselfe an Apostle hath taught, then were these excusable by their Adversaries testimonies, whose Prolocutor in a Convocation assembled, publikely confessed that these dejected Ministers had the Word, but the Prelates in place the possession of the Sword; which how they then made it drunke with the bloud of Gods Saints, let him that hath the two edged Sword in his mouth, at the great day of triall declare, to whose judgement and mercy I leave them.

(87) Sixty foure more were persecuted for their profession and faith, whereof seven were whipped, sixteene perished in prison, and were buried in dunghils, many lay in captivitie condemned, but were released, and saved by the happy entrance of peaceable Elizabeth; and many fled the Land in those daies of distresse, amongst whom most memorable is that of Katherine Dutchesse of Suffolke, with her husband Richard Bartu Esquire, whose Story and troubles happened as followeth.

The flury of Katherine Dutchesse of Suffolke.

(88) This Lady Katherine was the onely daughter and sole heire of Lord William, Baron of Willoughby, and of Eresby; and the last wife of Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolke lately deceased; in whose time how shee affected the Papall Profession, in massing, and maskings, was made knowne by cloathing a dogge in a Rotchet, and calling him Gardiner: and againe, in the dayes of King Edward, Gardiner saluting her from his prison window in the Tower, shee told him, it was well with the Lambes now the Wolfe was shut up. These stucke sore upon the Bishops stomacke, who being now risen to bee Lord Chancellour of England, and shee in disgrace with the Queene for her match in marrying Master Barta, a man too inferiour for her high estate, he thought it a fit time and occasion to requite, and to that end sent for Master Bartu her husband, charging him to bee indebted foure thousand pound to the Queene, which was owing her by his Ladies late Husband, the Duke of Suffolke, unto whom shee was Executrix, but this was onely the traine of a false fire, and the Dutchesse religion the marke he aymed at; for whom Master Bartu so wisely wrought, as himselfe was appointed to be her perswader, and so inwardly grew with the Lord Chancellor, that by his meanes he obtained licence to travell beyond Seas, for a debt owing to his Dutchesse by the Emperour.

(89) Bartu being gone, and Lady Katherine secretly to follow, upon the first of Ianuary with foure men, two women, and her young daughter, her selfe apparrelled like a Merchants wife, from Lyon Key in London departed, the morning very mysty, and her heart fraught with feare; for no sooner was she gone, then newes thereof came to the Court, and search made after her, as farre as to Leigh, before her Barke could attaine to the place: where being shrowded by a Merchant, under the name of his daughter, shee escaped to Sea; but twice her Ship with contrary windes was driven to the same Shoare, to her great danger, and no little griefe: yet lastly, shee arrived in Brabant, where shee met with her Husband; whence (being clad like a frose) they came into Cleveland, and at Santon seated themselves, till further provision could be made.

The Dutchesse of Suffolke flith the Land.

(90) But the Townesmen suspecting they were not the Persons they went for, and the Bishop of Arras hearing that they were Protestants, purposed with the Magistrate to impeach their Liberties, which Bartu hearing of, with his Broe and Daughter, attended onely with two servants, suddenly made away unto Wesell, a Towne priviledged with the Stilliard in London. In travell they were overtaken by night, the weather was rainy, & the thaigh upon a great frost, made the way more deepe, in which distresse, his two servants he sent to seeke some reliefe, whilest himselfe (the surer on foot) bare the childe; and the Dutchesse to ease him bare his Rapier and Cloake.

(91) Thus passing thorow mire, dirt, and darke night, about seven of the Clocke, all wet and weary, they got unto Wesell, where he being suspected to be a Launce-knight, and shee his woman no better then naught, could get no entertainment; the language they had not, the childe cryed pittifully, the mother wept bitterly, the cold was extreame, and the raine powred downe, as the cloudes had beene broken. In this distresse, the Church-porch was thought upon to shrowd them from raine, and to that end Master Barto sent his two servants to buy Coales and straw: but repairing towards this his cold Inne, he met with two Boyes that understood Latine, of whom hee demanded for the Ministers House, who presently brought him to the place, where he supped. His name was Pernell, and had beene in England, where, of the Dutchesse hee had received kinde curtesie, and now at Wesell imployed his Ministery among certaine Wallons, who hearing that the Dutchesse was fled out of England, and that at Santon shee lived nothing safe, had procured for their abode in Wesell, without making knowne who these English were, save onely unto the chiefe Magistrate.

The great distresse of the Dutchesse.

(92) Master Bartu desiring to speake with the Minister, hee presently came downe, who seeing the Dutchesse so disguised in apparell, and bemyred in dirt, could not speake unto her for teares, and bringing them in with glad hearts no doubt, Master Bartu changed apparell with the good man, the Dutchesse with his wife, and their childe, with the childe of the House: and thus were they comforted by this good Preachers meanes.

The Dutchesse fought after to be impeached.

(93) Here they seated not long, but that a sudden watch-word was sent them from Sir John Mason, Queene Maries Ambassador in Netherland, that the Lord Paget had fained an errand to the Spaw, and that the Duke of Brunswicke with ten Ancients, would passe by Wesell for the service of Austricke, against the French King, by whom the Dutchesse and her Husband should be intercepted, and delivered unto the Lord Paget.

(94) From hence therefore in hast they removed to the Towne Wincheim in high Germany, which was seated in the Palsgraves Dominions, where by his Protection, they continued till their maintenance began to scant, and they also almost fainting under so heavy a burthen, began to faile of all hope. At which very instant (GOD so moving the hearts of his Princes) the Palatine of Vilna, and the King of Pole hearing of their distresse, sent them a safe conduct, under the Palatines Seale, with assurance of maintenance, if they would come unto those parts.

God doth help when man doth faile.

(95) From Wincheim therefore they forth-with departed, and in Wagon tooke towards Franckford, but by the Landgraves Captaine were intercepted and set upon in the high way, so that Master Bartu was forced to stand at defence, wherein the Captaines Horse was slaine under him, and the cry maintained, that he was slaine himselfe, whereupon Bartu by the counsell of the Dutchesse, and swiftnesse of his Horse fled amaine, but was so eagerly followed upon opinion of murther, that hee hardly escaped with life; yet lastly they got into Poland, where they were honourably entertained until the death of Queene Mary, whose life in the meane while let us returne to relate.

(96) The November next following her marriage, the Queene was reported to have beene conceived with child, for joy whereof Te Deum was commanded solemnly to be sung, and Processions and prayers made for her safe deliverance. The Queene tooke her Chamber, the Court was full of Midwives, and Gentlewomen attendants, Rockers were provided, the Cradle prepared, and all made so certaine, that some were punished for making doubt of the contrary. Insomuch that it passed in Parliament, that if God should take away Queene Mary, this their young Master comming into the World, should finde himselfe provided for; where it was by Act ordained, that King Philip should bee Protector of her Issue, and Governour of the Realmes, untill their Prince, or Princesse should come to able yeares.

Acts an 3 Mon. p. 1643. b.

(97) Howbeit as it should seeme this Spanish King had little confidence in the English, for, at his first entrance, he had the Hall doore of his Court continually kept shut, neither any suffered to enter, unlesse his businesse was first made knowne: the Lords having leave to depart London, had strait commandement to send all their Harnesse and Artillery to the Tower; which was done, in regard of the maligners of this marriage: yea, and somewhat doubtfull he was also of those, who in shew bare him a faire face; the rather for that * a Nobleman in consultation, had given his counsell to cut off Lady Elizabeths head, assuring himselfe, that those so bad minded to their naturall Princesse, could not bee better unto him a stranger: who contrariwise upon this ground so laid the foundation of his true honour, as it gained him love of all true English hearts: for from that day he never left to solicite his Queene for the delivery of that innocent Princesse her sister, who still remained a solitary Prisoner in Woodstocke, though no proofes could bee brought for any offence.

The feares of King Philip.

King Philip a great friend unto Lady Elizabeth.

(98) At last his suit was obtained, and Lady Elizabeth brought unto Hampton Court, having not seene the Queene for two yeares before, here she was lockt up, and laid at by Gardiner to submit her selfe, till some foureteene daies after, shee was sent for into the Queenes Chamber about ten of the Clocke in the night: which shee no sooner had entred, but falling upon her knees, shee prayed God to preserve her Soveraigne Majestie; protesting her loyaltie and truth to her Person, whatsoever had beene spoken or instigated to the contrary. Vnto whom the Queene somewhat sharply said; Then you will not confesse your offence, I see; but rather stand stoutly upon your truth; I pray God your truth may so fall out; if not (quoth the Princesse) I request neither favour nor pardon at your Majesties hand: well then, said the Queene, you stand so stiffely upon your own loyalty, belike you suppose to have beene wrongfully punished: I must not say so to your Majestie, said Lady Elizabeth: but you will then so report to others it seemeth, (said Queene Mary) no, and it please your Majesty, said the Lady, I have borne, and must beare the burthen my selfe, I most humbly beseech your Graces good opinion of me, and to thinke me your true Subject, which from the beginning hitherto I have ever beene, and will bee for ever so long as my life lasteth. The Queene replying in Spanish, said; God knoweth: and so they departed; King Philip as is thought, standing behind the Arras, heard what was said.

Lady Elizabeth brought in presence of the Queene.

The conference of the Queene and Lady Elizabeth.

(99) Some seven dayes after, her Grace was discharged of Bennisield her laylor, and had leave of libertie, yet so, that Sir Thomas Pope, a Privy Counsellor, and M. Gage the Queenes Gentleman Vsher, were still her Attendants all Queene Maries time: her Gentlewoman Mistresse Ashley was sent to the Fleete, and three other waiting Maides unto the Tower; but the death of Gardiner immediately following, these stormes grew more calmer, and Lady Elizabeth every day more affectionately respected.

Lady Elizabeth discharged of imprisonment.

(100) About this time, William Constable, alias Fetherston, a Millers sonne in the North, bruited himselfe to be King Edward the sixt, but was seconded by none of any esteeme, and therefore the lesse dangerous, or likely to be beleeved. Notwithstanding all diligent search was laid for the Counterfeit; and hee lastly taken at Eltham in Kent, from whence to Hampton Court he was presently conveyed, where his answers were so simple, that he was esteemed as a franticke, and sent to the Marshall-Sea for a Lunaticke foole: and from thence in a Cart this counterfeit King (whose Crowne was a paper inscribed with his fault) was brought unto Westminster, and from thence whipped to Smithfield, whench he was banished into the North, and without further punishment was so released: But this Fetherston the next yeare (as a dogge returning to his vomit) gave it forth that King Edward was alive, whereupon he was againe apprehended, condemned of Treason, and hanged at Tyburne.

(101) Now the expected time of Queene Maries deliverance being fully approached, a rumour ranne in London, and elsewhere, that a Prince was borne; for joy whereof the Bels were rung, the Bone-fires flamed, Processions made, and some in their Sermons described the beauty of that goodly Boy, and great Prince. At Antwerpe also the like triumphs were made by the English Merchants, the Mariners shooting off their Ordonance; for which an hundred Pistolets were sent them from the Lady Regent: but these flying reports proved but wind, which turned the Vane shortly into another point; for the truth bursting forth, told for a certaine, that the Queene had never beene conceived, neither indeed was ever like to be: which raised as many doubts, as had beene tales of her deliverance: some affirming, that shee was with Child, but miscarried; some, that shee was deceived by a Tympany: and some that this rumour was spread for a policy: but what the truth was, saith Grafton, I referre unto others that know more.

(102) King Philip thus frustrate of his hope for his Heire, upon the fourth of September went over the Seas to visite his Father the Emperour, and to take possession of the Low-Countries, where hee stayed one yeare and sixe monethes, to the great griefe of Queene Mary his wife, whom as some thought he little affected, and this his long stay made the suspition no lesse. But now returning to Dover, he was by his Queene met on the way, and brought through London, accompanied with many Peeres of the Realme, as in triumph against a Coronation.

(103) In whose absence many conspiracies had beene intended, but their foggy smoakes were utterly extinguished before the fire could burst into flame: for certaine persons plotting to robbe the Queenes Exchequer at Westminster, meant with the money to raise warre in the Land; the Leaders into this attempt were Henry Peckham, John Daniel, Richard Prudall, John Throgmorton, John Dethick, William Stanton, William Rossey, John Beadell, and White, the revealer of the same intendments. These all excepting White, were at sundry times executed, and Sir Anthony Kingston apprehended for the same, died on the way unto London.

(104) The like stirres was attempted by one Cleber a Schoolemaster, sometime at Dys in Norfolke, who in the Parish Church of Tarle, among a great assembly at the celebration of a marriage, stood up, and read a penned, but traiterous Proclamation against the Queene, perswading the people to take Armes, and to free the Land of wrongs done by strangers.

Conspiracies in Norfolke.

(105) So likewise Thomas Stafford, second sonne to the Lord Stafford, with other Conspirators against the King and Queene, fearing the just punishments for their deserts, had fled the Land into parts beyond the Seas; from whence attempting still to broach their Rebellions, they sent certaine Bookes and Letters written and printed, full of most slanderous untruths: and now following King Philip into England, assisted by some English and strangers, tooke by stealth the Castle of Scarborough in Yorkeshire, where he published a most shamefull Proclamation mation against the Queene, trayterously affirming that shee was neither rightfull, nor worthy of raigne, and that the King had given unto his Spaniards the greatest and strongest holds of the Land. But by the prowesse of Thomas Pearcey, (prefently created Earle of Northumberland) he was surprised, sent to London, and there made shorter by the head. All these stirres quieted, new troubles were rather sought for, then minisired, and more losse followed to Englands disshonour, then glory had beene gained by this Spanish great Match.

June 7.

(106) For the Emperour over-worne with the affaires of the world, and wearied with the troubles of turmoyling warres, or rather touched with remorse of conscience, for the infinite miseries brought by him upon Florence, Naples, Sicilie, Tuscany, Elbe, and Calabria, being perswaded that these mournefull jarres of Christian Princes, had given to the Turke advantage upon divers parts of Europe, hee called his Sonne King Philip of England unto Bruxels (as is said) where, by authenticke letters bearing date the five and twentieth of October, hee resigned all his Realmes unto him, commanding all his Estates and Subjects to acknowledge and hold him their lawfull King; and among many other instructions, and most wise exhortations, gave him charge chiefly to hold amitie with the French, lest otherwile the warres of those Puissant Nations might oppresse all Christendome.

(107) King Philip indeed was much inclined to Peace, and Queene Mary his Wife at that time much more, both to hold him with her at home, and to support the Religion which shee had raised, by restoring the Clergy their wonted possessions, whereof much was then held in the Noblemens hands, from whose hard hold, hardly could any thing be wrested; but those in her owne, she freely resigned by Parliament, with this most Christian resolution, and Princely saying: that shee set more by the salvation of her owne Soule, then shee did by the revenues of ten Kingdomes, and so committed the restauration and disposse thereof unto the Pope, and Cardinall Poole his Legate, to the great wealth of the Church, and improverishing of the Crowne.

(108) King Philip following his Fathers advice, made peace with France to continue for five yeares, which no sooner was made, then was againe broken, but most of all to the losse of the English: for the Kings did not love, though their weapons were laid downe, and ancient hatred bred daily new discontents: one principall was minisired by Pope Paul the fourth, then an enemy unto the Spaniard, whom Duke Alva had mued up within the walles of Rome: His hope of helpe was in Henry the French King, unto whom he sent a triumphant Haste, with a stately Sword, and thereupon had succour by the Guize, who by force made his way open into Rome: But the French decreasing for want of pay, and the Spaniard still raising their Trophees of victory, the Pope thought it surest to hold with the strongest, and so made frustrare his amitie with the French.

(109) Queene Mary of England, now the Pope was for Spaine, and Philip her husband preparing for France, to shew her great love and obedience to both, rather fought an occasion against King Henry, then any minisired by him for the breach of peace. Her pretenses were many, as that the French King had instigated one Dudley, and Ashton, unto a new conspiracy, which they consulted upon in his Ambassadours House in London, and being revealed, fled into France, where they were maintained by an annuall pension. The like shee alleadged against King Henry for succouring of Stafford, and his rebellious complices, for suffering his Pyrats to molest her Seas, and for want of more, renewed the remembrances of Northumberland, and Wyats rebellions, who as was alleadged, were supported by him.

(110) These things premised, a defiance was sent into France, and was pronounced unto Henry at Rhemes, by Clarenceaux King at Armes. The French King loth to heare of these warres, made his answer and preparations accordingly: and Queene Mary contrary to promise, entangling her Subjects with the quarrels of the Spaniards, with sound of Trumpet in London proclaimed warres against France. To prosecute which, King Philip her Husband passed over to Callis, and thence into Flanders, where he made provision to enter the field: after whom the Queene sent a thousand Horsemen, foure thousand Footmen, and two thousand Pioners, and the Earle of Pembrooke was appointed Captaine Generall, under whom in severall places served Vicount * Montacute, the Lord Grey of Wilton, the Earle of * Rutland, the Earle of * Lincolne, the Earle of Bedford, the Earle of * Leicester, and the Earle of Warwicke, the Lords, Howard, De la Ware, Windsor, Bray, Shandoys, and Dudley, with many other Knights of approved valiancy.

(111) These passing the Seas, joyned with King Philip, whileft the Dukes of Savoy, and Brunswicke, the Earles of Egmond, Horne, and Mansfield, had invaded the French confines, and planted a strong siege before Saint Quintins; to whose rescue Monsieur Mountmorancy Constable of France, came with nine hundred men at Armes, as many light Horsemen, seven hundred Roisters, twenty two Ensignes of Lancequenets, and sixteene Ensignes of the French: and thus furnished, he meant to put more Souldiers into the Towne, but in the assay so miscarried, that himselfe was both hurt and taken prisoner with eight Noblemen more, all of them Knights of the Order, any not many dayes after, King Philip with his English came to the siege, by whose manly prowesse Saint Quintins was taken, for joy whereof great triumphs were made in England, which long lasted not, through the losse of Callis.

S. Quintins taken by the English. August 20.

(112) For this great victory made the English both negligent and careleste, so that the Towne of Callis, and the Forts thereabout for defence, were unrespectively regarded, and besides the neglect of supply to those places, the Souldiers thinking all out of danger, stood gazing at the shadow till the substance was lost: for the French being netled, that St. Quintins was Philips, let slip no occasion wherein was advantage: and the Duke of Guize imploying the Constables place, determined to put to proofe an enterprize for Callis, which long and many times had beene purposed upon.

The English negligent after Saint Quintins was wonne.

(113) This danger fore-seene, intelligence thereof was sent into England, but no supply heard of, first the Master of the Ordonance posted to the Councell, and secondly followed the Captaine of the Castle himselfe, but either by wilfull negligence or lacke of credite with the Queene, and Councell, those businesses in France were slenderly regarded, untill the supply was altogether too late. For the Duke of Guize with a marvellous celeritie approached the English Frontier, under a colour to victuall Boloigne, and Ard, and upon a little sorry plat of ground, intrenched at Sandgate, and thence dividing his Army into two parts, sent the one unto Ricebancke, whileft the other laid battery to two Forts at once, both which hee wanne within the space of twelue houres, the Captaine and Souldiers secretly departing to Callis. The like succesfe had the French against Ricebanke, being abandoned by the English Souldiers, and left to the Guize, and his disposse.

(114) Then were Cannons mounted against Callis it selfe, and with continuall battery for three dayes together, a breach made in the wall, not farre from the Water-gate, but yet unassaultable, the English within so maintained the defence: this then a traine of false fire (for the French never meant their accesse that way) whileft all attended to make good the breach, the Duke had planted fifteene double Cannons against the Castle, which once perceived, the Callizians knowing their resistance too weake, sto-

Calis surrendred to the French.

(117) The Lord Wentworth then Deputy of the Towne, seeing all in like danger if meanes were delayed, sent unto the Castle to have a Parley for composition, which the French forth-with accepted, and sent our two Gentlemen for pledges, whilest Iohn Heisfield Master of the Ordonance, and Edward Hall Constable of the Castle, concluded upon these dishonourable Articles, as followeth:

Vnhonourable Articles.

1 That the Towne, the great Artillery, Victuals and Munition should bee yeelded freely to the French.

2 That the lives of all the Inhabitants should bee saved, and have their safe conduct to depart.

3 That the Lord Deputy, with fifty others whom the Duke would appoint, should remaine prisoners, and be put to their ransome.

The hard usage of the English.

(116) Things thus ordered, the English were commanded into the Churches of our Lady, and Saint Nicholas, where they remained that whole day, the night following, and untill the next day in the afternoone, without either meate or drinke, in which time the Duke of Guize commanded by Proclamation, that all Iewels, Plate and Money, to the value of a groate should be laid upon the Altar, and that upon paine of death, a forrowfull offertory towards the English, and a great enrichment unto the French. Then was the Towne voyded of five hundred ordinary Souldiers (a small Garrison indeed to man such a place) of Townesmen, women and Children, foure thousand two hundred; the Lord Wentworth, Deputy, Sir Ralph Chamberlaine Captaine of Ricebanke, Nicholas Alexander Captaine of Newnambridge, Edward Grimston, Iohn Rogers, and others, to the number of fifty were sent prisoners into France, untill ransome were paid: And thus the Towne and Forts that were wonne by the victorious King Edward the third, and that by no lesse then eleven moneths siege, having now beene possessed by the English the space of two hundred and eleven yeeres, was in the compasse of eight dayes besieged, surprized and wonne in the depth of Winter, to the Worlds wonder, and great suspition of treachery, which happened the seventeenth day of Ianuary, and in the same moneth were surrendred the strong Forts of Guines, and Hames, whereby all the English footing was lost in the Continent of France.

Edward the eleventh from William the Conqueror, wonne it: and Mary the eleventh from Edward lost it.

(117) This winning of Calis and the other strong holds, as they were joyous to the French, and with Te Deum, and Bonefires celebrated with no lesse solemnity, then was that for the recovery of the County Oye, and the Fort won from the English, An. 1347. so was it grievous unto the English Nobility, and most of all unto Queene Mary her selfe. Insomuch as shee ceased not to travell with the King and Councell how to cover the dishonour of her Raigne, by this losse of Calis; and albeit some assayes were made against Breest, and Mounsieur Thermes the new Captaine of Calis taken prisoner by Count Egmont Generall for King Philip in the Low-Countries, yet the maine was neglected, and could not be recovered for any composition, which strucke so deepe a melancholy into Queene Maries minde, as she letted not to say, that the losse of Calis was written in her heart, and might therein be read when her body should be opened. In which passions shee continued the rest of her Raigne, which never had beene very prosperous, nor greatly pleasurable unto her selfe, after shee had abolished the Gospel, restored the Popes Supremacy, and married a stranger, who was unto her a stranger indeed.

(118) Of all since the Conquest her Raigne was the shortest, onely excepting that of Richard the Tyrant, but much more bloudy then was his, and more bloud spilt in that short time of her Raigne, then had been shed for case of Christianity, in any Kings time since Lucius the first establisher of the Gospell in this Realme. Her conceptions failing, extreame dearths raging, hurt done by thunders from heaven, and by fire in the royall Navy, forraigne losses, Calis surrendered, and King Philips keeping from Court, daily augmented Queene Maries melancholy, which lastly increasing to a burning feaver, made an end of her life, at her Mannor of S. Iames neere Westminster, the 17. of Novemb. and yeere of Christs incarnation 1558. when she had raigned five yeeres, foure moneths, and eleven dayes, and lived forty two yeeres, nine moneths and sixe dayes, whose body lyeth interred in a Chappell in the Minster of S. Peters at Westminster, without any monument or other remembrance.

An. Dom. 1558.

THe Cloud thus set, that threatned more stormes, and a quiet calme happening when the rage was at highest, that wished Sunne then ascended our Horizon, whose rayes (as had beene hoped) presently dispelled all foggy Mists from Englands faire Skie; which was, the most milde Princesse Lady Elizabeth, another Debora, and nursing mother of Gods Saints, who being then at Hatfield in Hertfordshire, was there first saluted Queene, and the same day, with great joy and full consent of both the Houses of Parliament (at that time assembled) was solemnly proclaimed Queene of England, with all other stiles rightly belonging to that Imperiall Title.

(2) Shee entred her Government upon Thursday the seventeenth of November, the same day that her sister Queene Mary died, the yeare of Christs assuming our flesh, 1558. and of her owne age, twenty foure yeares, two monethes and ten dayes. From *Hatfield shee removed unto Charterhouse in London, *from whence shee was royally attended unto the Tower, and all Complements prepared for her Coronation.

(3) All things in readineſſe upon the fourteenth of Ianuary, with great triumphes and ſumptuous ſhewes, ſhee paſſed thorow London towards Weſtminſter to receive the Imperiall Crowne; but before ſhe entred her Chariot in the Tower, acknowledging that the ſeat was Gods into which ſhee was to enter, and ſhe his Vicegerent to weild the Engliſh Scepter; in that royall aſſembly with eyes, and hands elevated to heaven upon her knees, ſhe prayed for his aſſiſtance, as Salomon did for wiſedome when he tooke the like charge; with a thankefull remembrance unto God for his continued preſervation, who had brought her thorow great dangers unto that preſent dignitie. In which triumphall State as ſhee paſſed thorow the ſtreets of London, when the Booke of God was preſented unto her at the little Conduit in Cheape, ſhee received the ſame with both her hands, and kiſſing it, laid it to her breaſt ſaying, that the ſame had ever beene her chiefeſt delight, and ſhould bee the rule by which ſhee meant to frame her government. And to teſtifie her benigne acceptance of the Lord Major, and Citizens approved loves, ſhee aſſured them that ſhee lacked no will, nor (as ſhee hoped) power to'be to them as gracious a Prince as ever raigned in the Land, and that for the publike good, if occaſion were miniſtred ſhe would ſpend her deareſt blond.

(5) Preſently there followed a Parliament, wherein the Title of Supremacie was againe reſtored to the Crowne, with the firſt fruits, and Tenths of all Eccleſiaſticall livings, and the Booke of Common Prayer ratified for an uniforme celebration of Gods Divine Service in the Engliſh Churches; as alſo thoſe Acts repealed that were enacted by Queene Mary, in favour of the Romiſh Religion. Things thus eſtabliſhed, and libertie given to the Goſpel; many that had fled the Realme in caſe of conſcience, returned, and were provided for according to their worths, and that Gods Truth might be eſtabliſhed, (which thing her Princely heart chiefly fought after) a conference was commanded, and begun at Weſtminſter the laſt of March, concerning certaine Articles to be diſcuſſed amongſt the Divines. (6) During the time of this Parliament a Petition was made unto her Majeſtie for the hope of royall Iſſue, to moove unto her marriage; unto which eloquent Oration delivered by the Speaker, ſhee replyed with great thankes for their loving care for "her, and their owne Countrey: but as touching "their requeſt, ſhee anſwered, that from the time, "when firſt ſhee conſidered her ſelfe to bee borne a "ſervitor of God, ſhee happily did chooſe, and in "truth beſt liked a Virgins life, from which, neither "Ambition of high marriages, which had been for- "merly offered her by her Prince, nor the grievances "ſuſtained by her, whiles ſhee lived among thoſe e- "nemies, who indignation was death, had hitherto "beene able to divert her: but whether her yeares, "and anſwer could concord together in their judici- "ous minds; ſhee certainly knew not; yet this ſhee "aſſured them, that as then ſhee ſtood ſo affected, "and if that affection changed, her choiſe ſhould be "onely of ſuch a one, as ſhould be as carefull, ſhee "would not ſay, as her ſelfe, (becauſe thee knew her "ſelfe beſt) but as any of them for the Realmes good, "and yet withall ſhee conſidered, that although her "ſelfe, for their welfare (if need were) would not "ſhunne death, yet might her Iſſue (as often happe- "neth to the beſt parents) grow out of kinde, and "prove ungracious. And therefore to leave behind "her a more laſting and gratefull remembrance; ſhee "held it ſufficient, that a Marble-ſtone ſhould de- "clare to poſteritie, that ſhee a Queene had raigned, "lived, and dyed a Virgin: and ſo with many thanks "diſmiſſed the Aſſembly. How the firſt was accomplished, we that lived under her raigne have ſeene; but how inſufficient that one ſtone is to containe, and continuate the remembrance of her vertuous, pious, and glorious government, the whole world doth at this day, and ſhall to all ſucceeding ages witneſſe, whileſt the Earth reſts in the Center, and the Heavens have reſtleſſe movings.

(8) The Earle of Arundell, the Biſhop of Ely, and Doctor Wotton Deane of Canterbury remained Commiſſioners in France at the death of Queene Mary, upon compoſition for the regaining of Calis, and other peeces loſt in the cauſe of King Philip: her Majeſtie ſent them inſtructions to continue their demands, and certaine ſure grounds wheron they might worke. The firſt was that the quarrell of warre was not Englands, but Philips of Spaine, in whoſe favour Queene Mary his wife againſt the will of her Councell, ſent him aide of her Subjects. And if in caſe the Proofes that Calis was Englands.

French ſhould challenge Calis as inhereditary unto the Crowne of France, to that they ſhould anſwer, that there were many Signiories and places in France, whereunto the Engliſh might make their juſt claime, and ſome in poſſeſſion ſince Calis was Engliſh, which Towne was not onely Lawfully granted, and aſſured from the French themſelves unto the Crowne of England, but was alſo allowed by Articles of all treatiſes of Peace, for the ſpace of two hundred yeares and more, this evermore ſpecially provided, that Calis ſhould remaine in the quiet poſſeſſion of the Engliſh.

And the better to impreſſe the delivery of Calis, in the mould of the French, they were to demand certaine arrerages, wherein their King and Realme had fallen for great ſummes of monies, and debts accruing to the Engliſh Crowne: aſwell by the acknowledgement of the mother of King Francis then being Regent of France, and judgement thereupon given; as alſo by the treatie of More, de dato, 1525. The treatie of perpetuall peace, de Dato, 1527. And the late treaty betweene King Henry the eight, and King Francis, for the delivery of Bulloigne, de dato, 1546. by all which appeareth, that there was two Millions of Crownes due, and very little thereof yet paid, the Copies of which Treatiſes and Confeſſion, the ſaid Commiſſioners have with them. Alſo another debt of an hundred thouſand crownes, as appeareth by a Bill of King Francis hand. And where alſo there is one perpetuall penſion of fiftie thouſand crownes due, as appeareth by the treaty of perpetuall peace, and one other penſion of Salt, as appeareth by the ſame treatie. All which notwithſtanding, rather then the French ſhould retaine Callis, her Majeſtie was contented to remit the whole debt and arrerages: but without that, in no wiſe ſhee held it convenient to conclude peace with France, and that obtained, ſhee remitted the other Articles to the diſcretion of the Commiſſioners. But the Engliſh Queene was no more deſirous to have Callis, then the French King unwilling to let it goe. Whereupon laſtly it was thus concluded, That Callis ſhould remaine French, the terme of eight yeares, and thoſe expired, ſhould returne to the Engliſh upon forfeiture of five hundred thouſand crownes; the branch of which agreement, from the Latine, and that from the originall, is thus tranſlated.

Great ſummes of Money owed by France.

(9) It is covenanted, agreed, and concluded, that the ſaid moſt noble Lady Queene of England, ſhall ſuffer and permit the foreſaid moſt Chriſtian King of France, his heires and ſucceſſors, to hold, poſſeſſe, and peaceably enjoy from the day of the date of this preſent treaty, untill the terme of eight yeares following, the Towne of Callis, with the appurtinances and appendices belonging to the ſame; and alſo the Port or Haven of the ſaid Towne, with the Tower of Ruyſbanke, and alſo the Towers, Lordſhips, Pillages, and places of Newnambridge, Merke, Oye, Hams, Sandgate, the Tower and Towne of Guiſnes, and all the reſt of that County taken in this laſt warre, and all other Townes, Caſtles, Villages, Lands, Dominions, Territories, Waters, Rivers, Havens, Defences, Forts, and Shores, and generally all places whatſoever ſcituate unto them by the Sea, which ſhe the ſaid moſt Chriſtian King hath gotten in this laſt warre, and taken by force of Armes, in the raigne of the moſt noble Lady Mary, late Queene of England. And the ſaid moſt Chriſtian King, hath promiſed, and doth promiſe aſwell in his owne name, as in the name of the King Dolphin his ſonne, his heires, and ſucceſſors, for which Dolphin, the ſaid moſt Chriſtian King hath made himſelfe, and doth make himſelfe anſwerable, promiſing that he will take care of, and effect that the ſaid King Dolphin ſhall approve this treaty, and ratifie it, within two moneths after the date of this treaty, which ſaid terme of eight yeares being complete and ended, the ſaid moſt Chriſtian King his heires and ſucceſſors, ſhall preſently without delay, relinquiſh, deliver, and reſtore, or cauſe to be delivered, and reſtored to the ſaid moſt noble Princeſſe Elizabeth, Queene of England, her heires, and ſucceſſors, or to thoſe that ſhall be thereunto deputed by her, or her heires and ſucceſſors, the ſaid towne of Callis, with the appurtinances and appendices aforeſaid, and all other and ſingular places aforeſaid, and alſo the Towres, Caſtles, and fortreſſes whatſoever in the aforeſaid parts, and alſo the places now of late builded forteſied, or reedified during the ſaid terme of eight yeares; and the ſaid moſt Chriſtian King his heires and ſucceſſors ſhall leave the poſſeſſion of all the ſaid places, and depart from it, and wholly forſake the ſame. So that the moſt noble Lady Queene Elizabeth, her heires and ſucceſſors may peaceably enjoy, and quietly hold the poſſeſſion of them with all the rights, privileges, preeminences, ſuperiorities, recognitions, and all other authorities in the like manner, ſtate, condition and nature, in which the Kings of England have held them, and poſſeſſed them before the beginning of this laſt warre. Provided notwithſtanding, and expreſly covenanted, that the ſaid moſt Chriſtian King, his heires and ſucceſſors ſhall not be bound to reſtore or deliver the Townes and Fortreſſes, and places aforeſaid, otherwiſe then in the ſame ſtate, manner, and condition, in which now at this preſent they are, and hereafter ſhall be ſtrenthened and fortified by them, during the ſaid terme, yet ſo notwithſtanding as neither in the time of ſuch reſtitution nor before, that there be not any thing done of ſet purpoſe, whereby the former ſtate of the ſtrengthes, and fortifications which now it is in, or which hereafter added by them, be in any wiſe miniſhed, broken, or overthrowne, but that all things without fraud, be reſtored entire and unimpaired, in manner aforeſaid.

Queene Elizabeth her reply touching marriage.

Alſo it is covenanted and agreed, that during the terme of the ſaid eight yeares, it ſhall neither be lawfull for the ſaid Chriſtian King, nor for the ſaid moſt fortunate King and Queene of Scots; nor for the ſaid moſt happy Queene of England to innovate, attempt, or enterpriſe by warre any thing againſt each other, or for any one of them againſt the other, or againſt the Kingdomes, propper dominions, and Subjects of each other, either directly or indirectly, to the prejudice of this preſent treatiſe, &c. And likewiſe if any thing ſhall be ſo innovated and attempted by the ſaid moſt Chriſtian King, and moſt happy King and Queene of Scots, or the ſubjects of them, by the authoritie, commandement, and approbation of them, or any of them. Then the ſaid moſt Chriſtian King, and King Dolphin, their heires and ſucceſſors, by ſuch kinde of innovation attempted, upon the deed done, ſhall bee bound and obliged to leave and depart from the poſſeſſion and occupation of the ſaid Towne of Callis, and of all other places aforeſaid on this ſide the Sea, taken of late from the Engliſh, by the ſaid moſt Chriſtian King. And all thoſe things they ſhall deliver and reſtore without any delay to the ſaid moſt worthy Queene of England, in the ſame manner and forme, in which at the ſaid terme of eight yeares, they were promiſed and covenanted to be reſtored: which reſtitution if it ſhall not be ſo made, the ſaid Merchants and pledges ſhall be bound to pay the ſaid penaltie of five hundred thouſand crownes to the ſaid moſt worthy Queene of England, and the covenant notwithſtanding of reſtoring the ſaid Towne ſhall nevertheleſſe remaine in force. Moreover if any of the Subjects of any of the Princes aforeſaid, of their owne authoritie, ſhall endeavour or attempt any thing againſt the ſubjects of either of the ſaid Princes in prejudice of this Treatiſe, he ſhall be puniſhed as an infringer of the Peace, according to the qualitie of the fact.

These covenants notwithſtanding they were ſealed and ſworne unto, yet were never performed at the yeares of expiration, though Merchants were bound, and hoſtages aſſigned to remaine in England till the money were paid.

(9) So ſuſpiciouſly had this Towne of Callis beene recovered from the Engliſh, that the L. Wentworth (the Deputie) was indited in Queene Maries daies, and now arraigned at Weſtminſter; the Marqueſſe of Northampton being his Iudge, and Lord Chiefe Steward of England for that day; but that Nobleman ſo nobly defended himſelfe, that he was acquitted by his Peeres, and wan a moſt honourable opinion for his many and faithfull ſervices.

(10) Her Highneſſe having thus cleared the English are from all Papall infection, and eſtabliſhed Peace, the greateſt benefit for the Subject; on the foureteenth of May, being Whitſunday, Divine Service began to be celebrated in the Engliſh tongue, whereby Gods Trumpet might be heard in a perfect ſound, and the prayers of the Congregation uttered with an underſtanding heart. To the end therefore that the Clergy, the Teachers of others, ſhould not be infected themſelves, the Oath of Supremacy, with other Articles, was offered unto them, the refuſers whereof were forthwith deprived, and others ſurrogated that were more loyally affected. In place of Poole deceaſed, Doctor Parker was conſecrated Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and of Yorke, Doctor Young in ſtead of Heath, who refuſed the Oath; and ſo of ſome others: then went forth Commiſſioners to ſuppreſſe thoſe Monaſteries reſtored by Queene Mary, and to caſt out thoſe Images ſet up in Churches, whoſe ſight having heated the blind zeale of many poore ignorant people in places of Oratory, were now themſelves in the ſtreets conſumed in the fire, at whoſe flames might be ſaid, as in Iſaiah touching peeces of like ſtuffe, had beene ſaid: I am warme, I have beene at the fire.

(11) After the reducing of this purer worſhip into Gods Church, the next care the Good Queene tooke, was to enrich her Realme, by reducing her Coynes into fine and pure Sterling, and debaſing of Copper monies: cauſing likewiſe great ſtore of Munition, Armour, and Powder to be brought into the Land, and laid up in a readineſſe as occaſion ſhould ſerve, that nothing might be wanting either for the wealth or ſafetie of the ſubject.

(12) But theſe her bleſſed beginnings in England were little as it ſeemeth to the liking of the French King, Whoſe hope (ſaith Leſlie) by certaine Acts of Parliament made by Queene Mary againſt her ſiſter the Lady Elizabeth to debarre her from the ſucceſſion of the Crowne, was to eſtabliſh Queene Mary of Scotland, who had lately married Prince Dolphine his Sonne, laying her Title from Margaret the eldeſt daughter of King Henry the ſeventh, linked in Marriage with Iames the fourth King of that name, he being the daughter of King Iames *the fifth his ſonne. (13) In Scotland Religion (as England had embraced it) began to be practiſed; Preachers ſpake boldly, and bookes were daily brought thither, which nothing at all commended the Pope, and by them (ſaith the Biſhop) the people were moved to a ſedition, which to prevent, the * Queene Regent cauſed an aſſembly of the Biſhops and Barons, unto whom the Miniſters preſented theſe Articles.

2 That Biſhoprickes and other Eccleſiaſticall Benefices ſhould be beſtowed upon qualified men.

3 That ſuch perſons enjoying the profits, ſhould performe their duties and preach the word to the people.

4 That none ſhould be admitted in time to come, into the Miniſtery, unleſſe his life and learning were anſwerable to that excellent calling.

(14) To the two firſt, the Biſhops alleadging the Cuſtomes of the Romane Church, would in no wiſe conſent, leaving every man at libertie privately to pray in what language he beſt liked; and the election of their Biſhops to the preſcription of the Canon Law, and to the appointment of their Queene. For the two latter, they affirmed, no better order could be preſcribed then that of their Common Law, which impoſeth upon them, aſmuch as was required; and thereupon they began to put the ſame in execution, commanding all that had charge of ſoules to fit themſelves to their functions, otherwiſe to looke for no favour from deprivation, after the terme of five moneths. Which was (ſaith the ſame Author) the principall cauſe, that a great number of young Abbots, Priors, Deacons, and Beneficed men, did aſſiſt the enterprize, and practiſed devices for the overthrow of the Catholike Religion.

(15) True it is, that at the Preaching of Iohn Knox, and other Miniſters affecting Reformation, not onely the Images, Altars, and other like things of abuſe, were caſt downe and burnt, but alſo the Charterhouſe of the Friers at Perth deſtroyed, which was the faireſt Abbey in the Realme of Scotland, then followed the overthrow of the Monaſteries of Saint Andrewes, of Stone, of Striveling, and of Linlithaw; which over-heady proceedings cauſed ſuch ſtirres in the Land, that the Lords of the Combination encamped at Couper, to abide battle againſt the French (who came into Scotland to impeach their purpoſes) had not the travels of ſome Noblemen prevailed on either part.

(16) The French King, thus over-buſie about Scotlands ſtate, was overcareleſſe of his owne, when (at ſolemnizing the marriages of his daughter and ſiſter) he would needs be a Challenger at Tilt, ſeconded by the Duke of Guize and Ferrara, which triumphant joy was ſuddenly clouded with a ſad Cataſtrophe. For to runne his laſt (and indeed his laſt) courſe in favour of his Queene, hee ſent a Lance to the Earle of Montgomery, with a command to have him enter the Tilt; but he excuſing himſelfe from running againſt his Majeſtie, alleadged, that fortune the day before, afforded him not to breake one ſtaffe, and that now (as he feared) ſhe would put him to a ſecond ſhame, but the King, deſtiny ſo enforcing, and his dare fully runne, ſent him a ſecond command, which Montgomery very unwilliagly obeyed, and breaking his Lance upon the Kings Cuiraſſe, a ſplinter thereof, his Beaver being ſomewhat open, ſtrucke him ſo deepe in the eye, that thereupon ſhortly hee ended his life.

He hearing of the troubles raiſed there, in caſe of Religion, ſent Mounſieur de la Broche to ſtrengthen the Field, and the Biſhop of Amiens to aſſiſt the Queene Regent, with his faire reaching and inſeeing councell. Surely the preparation to withſtand them was great, and the Combinators many that ſtood for Reformation, as namely, one Duke, fourteene Earles, and eleaven Lords, beſides other of name and account; but knowing their Adverſaries forces, and ſeeing thoſe ſtrangers to poſſeſſe divers of their Townes and Forts, to the oppreſſing of the Kingdome under forraine ſubjection, they were enforced to become Petitioners unto Queene Elizabeth, for aide to expell the French, who ſought the ſubverſion of the Realmes State.

(19) From thence they marched toward Leiterike, where a Trumpet from the Queene Regent met them with a ſafe conduct for Sir James Croft, and for Sir George Howard, with ſixe other Gentlemen to accompany them unto her preſence in the Caſtle of Edenborough; unto which the Generall and the Scotiſh Lords agreed, with an abſtinence from Armes during the conference. But the French (the meane while) under the command of Monſieur Doiſell iſſued forth of Leith, and in good array tooke the field, which when the Lord Gray perceived, he ſent an Harold unto them, willing them to depart till the Engliſh were returned, according to the order betwixt their Regent and him; but they returned him anſwer, they were on their Miſtreſſes ground, which they meant to make good, and thereupon diſcharged a whole volley of ſhot upon the Engliſh Army.

(20) The Allarum thus given when leaſt it was expected, a cruell skirmiſh began, wherein dyed of the French about ſevenſcore perſons, the reſt were enforced backe into Leith, and many of the Engliſh both hurt and ſlaine. Whereupon they intrenched the Crag, and planted their Ordonance againſt Leith, upon whoſe Steeples the French had mounted their great Cannons, whence their Bullets flew amaine; and ere long a bold attempt was undertaken by them, who with fiftie Horſemen, and five hundred Harquebuſiers iſſued out of Leith, and aſſayled the Engliſh new trenches with ſuch valour, as they entred, and a while poſſeſſed the ſame; where they tooke Maurice Barkeley priſoner, won his Enſigne, cloyed the touch-holes of three great Peeces, and ſlew no ſmall numbers of their reſiſters.

(21) The Engliſh by this time had armed themſelves (for this aſſault was unexpectedly given) and Captaine Vaughan with his bravely entred the Trench, who being ſeconded by Captaine Sommerſet, Reade, and Arthur Grey, recovered the ſame with ſome ſlaughter of men, the Ordonance from Leith diſcharging upon them, to the great annoyance of their honourable ſervice; and now being Maſters of what was loſt, they cleared the great Ordonance which the French had ſtopped, and caſt a new Trench along by the old Chappell, whence with their great Peeces they beate downe the Steeples of Saint Anthony, and Saint Nicholas in Leith, and diſmounted the Peeces that therein lay levelled againſt them.

The Engliſh mocke their Enemies.

(22) In the full courſe of which diſſentions, the Queene Mother, Regent of Scotland, (a Lady of excellent endowments of minde) conſumed with thoughts, diſpleaſures, and melancholy, departed this life in Edenborough Caſtle: the Lords waxing ſtronger, and Leith much weaker through extremity of famine, and the French King, (the onely pillar on whom their ſtrength did conſiſt) not able to aſſiſt them. Who being brought daily into feares, through new tumults ariſing, and increaſed in his owne Countrey of Amboyſe, was forced (ſaith Leſlie) to yeeld up all the Dominions, both of France, and of Scotland, unto Pope Pius the fourth, to be at his command and defence; but his Holineſſe fearing his owne tottering eſtate, like a wiſe man, that meant to warpe no more then hee could well weave, ſuffered King Francis to ſeeke for other redreſſe, which he did from her, that was more willing and better able to give him content.

Peace concluded betwixt England and France.

(23) For ſending his Ambaſſadors unto Queene Elizabeth, whoſe noble ſpirit himſelfe had firſt provoked, deſired her peace to be had with Scotland, and that Commiſſioners might be appointed to meete with his in that Realme; alledging that it was unfitting to a Soveraigne to ſue to his Subjects, as hee was over them by his marriage with their onely Queene. Her Princely minde ever forward to aſſiſt the afflicted, and now deſirous to ſave Chriſtian bloud, diſpatched into Scotland, Sir William Cecill her Principall Secretary, with Doctor Watton Deane of Canterbury, one of her ſacred Councell, eminent for his ſingular prudence, and formerly imployed upon like affaires in France.

Commiſſioners of England and France meet in Scotland.

Articles of Accord.

(24) Theſe falling in conference, concluded finally upon certaine Articles, whereof thoſe that concerned England, were theſe: That neither the King of France, nor his Queene of Scotland, ſhould thence-forth uſe the Armes or Titles of England, or Ireland, and that all Letters ſealed with thoſe Armes ſhould be called in within ſixe moneths ſpace; that both the Engliſh and French ſhould depart Scotland, ſome few excepted, employed upon occaſions, and that a generall pardon ſhould be enacted by Parliament, concerning all ſuch as had beene in theſe ſtirres. Which Parliament was affembled at Edenborough in Auguſt following. Theſe things accomplihed, an Ambaſſage of thankes was ſolemnly addreſſed unto Queene Elizabeth by the Earles of Morton, Glencarne, and the young Laird of Lethington, with proffer that the Earle of Arran, the greateſt Lord in account among them, ſhould bee at her diſpoſe for marriage, which (as they well hoped) would be to her ſelfe.

An Ambaſſage of thanks to Q. Elizabeth.

(25) With the like conceived hope the yeare before, Iohn Duke of Finland, ſecond ſonne to Guſtavus King of Sweden, was ſent to her by his Father, to treate a marriage for his elder brother Ericus, who was moſt honourably entertained, but diſmiſſed without all hope of his ſuite. Notwithſtanding, Guſtavus being dead, Ericus now raigning King of Sweden, having impriſoned his brother Iohn, ſolicited her Majeſty the ſecond time, but to his diſhonour as it fell out, for his ſuite rejected in the Engliſh Court, he attempted to match with the youngeſt daughter of Philip Landgrave of Haſſia, who hearing that he had twice received deniall in England, denied him alſo with ſome diſgrace, giving his daughter unto Adolfe Duke of Holſt, Vncle unto Fredericke King of Denmarke, at that time enemy to Ericus.

(26) The Peace ſcarcely was concluded betwixt England and France, when Francis the young King was taken away by death, and another pupill King crowned, even Charles his younger brother, and ninth of that name, who was guided altogether by the Regency of the Queene Mother, and moleſted with the civill diſſentions betwixt the Princes of Guize and Conde. For whoſe reconciliation Queene Elizabeth ſent Sir Henry Sidney, Lord Preſident of Wales; unto which her endeavours, howſoever the French gave countenance in Court, yet on the Seas they tooke her Merchants ſhips, impriſoned the men, and ſeized their goods, no other cauſe alledged but that they were Huguenors.

title, and her owne juſt and ancient title to thoſe forraine parts, eſpecially to Normandy.

(29) The Generall of theſe Engliſh ſo ſent, was the Lord Ambroſe Dudley, Earle of Warwicke, who following his charge before gone to Seas, arrived at Newhaven the nine and twentie of October, where his Commiſſion was proclaimed, and oath taken, unto whom ſtrengths of Scotiſh men were ſent him from Diep, whereof Monſieur Montgomery was preſently made Governour, having loſt Rohan unto the King of Navarre; though the unfortunate King bought the victory with his owne death, as he viewed the weaker parts of the Citie.

(30) To withſtand the Engliſh thus ſetled in Normandy, the Count Rheingrave was ſent, and in familiar conference told the Earle of Warwicke, that hee was come to be his neighbour; but proved indeed ſo covetous an encroacher, as laſtly he diſpoſſeſſed the Earle of the Towne. For albeit that many manly feates were therein performed by the Engliſh, and the place ſtored with prizals of wines; yet wanting freſh victuall, but eſpecially freſh water, which the enemy had cut off, the calamities were great, and much more augmented by a contagious peſtilence, that ſlew many more then did either famine or ſword; ſo that the Engliſh having poſſeſt the Towne for eleven moneths ſpace, now were conſtrained to ſurrender it upon compoſition, bringing thence many ſicke Souldiers that dangerouſly infected England with a long continuing plague.

The plague brought into England from Newhaven.

(31) Times motion in England now moved onely with the benefit of peace, and no act memorable to commit unto Hiſtory; let us ſupply this Interim with looking a little into the ſtate of Religion in France; as we have ſeene, and ſomewhat touched the proceedings thereof both in England and Scotland. The Goſpell ſpreading farre in that faire Continent, the impugners tooke occaſions to raiſe many ſtirres, and all in ſhew to race out new hereſies, as they accuſed and called the reformed doctrine. For which cauſe the French Townes burning in the flames of ſeditions, the Proteſtants bloud was thought fitteſt to quench them, and the rapines committed upon chaſte wives and Virgins, was pretended to be canceld by a marriage wrought and contracted betwixt two Princes of the bloud: which were Henry of Bourbon, Prince of Navarre, a favourer of the Goſpell, and Margaret of Valois the third Daughter of King Henry the ſecond, and Siſter unto King Charles now raigning, a Princeſſe much devoted to the Romiſh Religion. (32) Thus much was plotted by the Marſhall of Ceſſe, and the Maſter of Requeſts, with the device no doubt of ſome in higher place, who wrought the Queene of Navarre, under the pretence of great affection, that the French King bare unto her; and the Chaſtillon Admirall (a moſt zealous Proteſtant) under an intent of imployment for the defence of the Low-Countries, againſt the King of Spaine. This match indeed ſeemed to confirme a publike concord, onely the Popes diſpenſation muſt be had, by reaſon of pretended conſanguinitie of the parties, the one being petty Nephew, the other Grand-child of Francis the firſt King of France. And the Queene of Navarre made ſome ſcruple of the Ceremonies for the celebration, place, and Church; but civill reaſon overſwaying all difficulties, the Theater muſt be Paris, as the Capitall City, and the marriage acted without any change of Ceremony, or of royall forme.

(33) Chaſtillon the Admirall was formoſt at Court, where the Papals gave him place, and to take from him all jealouſie or miſtruſt, the King countenanced him ſo much, that hee repayed his loſſes ſuſtained in the warre, grants him the revenues of his brother the Cardinall Chaſtillon, that lately fled and dyed in England, treates with him familiarly, gives him a place in his Privy Councell, and ever honours him with the plauſible name of Father; inſomuch as the people began to murmure that King Charles not onely favoured the Huguenots, but was now become a Huguenot himſelfe. And the Admirall for his part thinking all upright, to that end moveth the King to treate a Peace with the Queene of England, to the prejudice of the Spaniards: with theſe motives among others; that Elizabeth was unmarried, and Henry Duke of Anjou had no wife, the dignitie of ſo high an alliance was honourable for the Duke, and the qualitie of a Kings brother was not to be contemned by the Queene; he having in his young yeares purchaſed great honour and reputation.

(34) The charge of this meſſage was committed to Marſhall Mountmorency, both to have his abſence at Court, the better to worke what was intended, and to ſtay her Majeſty by vertue of that peace, from attempting any thing againſt France, in favour of the Proteſtants. The Foord thus founded by the well-meaning Admirall, ſeemed the more ſafely paſſable: for the two Queenes of England and Navarre; the firſt of them granting the Peace ſo deſired, and the other without all jealouſie repayred to the French Court; where eighteene dayes after her arrivall, of a quotidian Fever ſhee dyed, though others ſaid, not without ſuſpition of poyſon, by the perfume of a paire of Gloves preſented unto her.

(35) Soone after, the marriage was ſolemnized upon a high Scaffold, built before the Church dore of Our Lady in Paris; and foure dayes ſpent in Playes, Feaſts, Dancing, and Maskes: all which were but traines and introductions unto what was intended: for the Admirall departing the Kings preſence with all complements of amitie, as hee paſſed from the Louure, and in reading a Petition, was with a Harquebuſſe levelled out of a window, ſhot into the left arme, and dangerouſly hurt. At which traiterous attempt, the King and Queene mother ſeemed to be greatly perplexed, viſiting him with all expedition, and for his further ſafety, commanded all his favourers (the Proteſtants) to be lodged, neere about him. But the night now approached, Coſſeines brake into his Baſe-Court, and three of his Company entring his Bed-chamber, with their weapons barbarouſly murthered him, whoſe goared body at Guizes command, they caſt out of the Window, Guize himſelfe wiping the bloud from his face, acknowledged him to be the man. His head they cut off, and preſented to the Queene-mother, and ſhee balming it, ſent it to her Holy Father for an aſſurance of the death of his moſt capitall enemy.

And with the like hellish fury the bloudy faction, oppreſſed the Proteſtants, both in the Citie and Suburbs, ſparing neither ſexe, condition, nor age, through whoſe ſtreets nothing was heard but ghaſtly horrour, armes, horſes, and death, with the pitifull ſhreikings of the Innocents, crying (but alaſſe in vaine) for mercy. On the other ſide, the ſhoutes of the murtherers prevailed, ſaying, that this one day ſhould end the quarrell, which neither Pen, paper, decrees of Iuſtice, nor open warre for twelue yeeres together could ever doe. Lamentable was the ſpectacle of thoſe ſacred and maſſacred carkaſes ſtrewed in the ſtreets, the pavements, Market places, and Rivers dyed with their bloud, and that Sabbath made direfull, and to the Papiſts infamous, with the bloudy pollution of ten thouſand Innocents, in the ſtaine whereof we will leave them, and returne our ſtile againe for England.

ment; a man cruell by nature, and claiming an inheritary right of the Province of Vlſter, as the O-Neales formerly had done of all Ireland. For in the troubleſome times of Robert Brus, when his brother Edward named himſelfe King of Ireland, Donald O-Neale, rowſed out of his larking holes, in his miſſive letters unto the Pope, ſtyleth himſelfe King of Vlſter, and in right of inheritance, the undoubted Heire of all Ireland. But his glorious ſhew being clowded before it was ſeene, his poſterity puld in their hornes like ſnailes, untill the fire-brands of Civill diſſentions betwixt the Houſes of Lancaſter and Yorke gave light to their footing, whileſt the Engliſh left Vlſter unto their cuſtody, and followed in England the faction which they beſt favoured.

(38) At which time, Henry O-Neale began to bee great by marrying the Daughter of Thomas, Earle of Kildare; as afterward alſo his ſonne * Con-More, O-Neale, marryed the Daughter of Girald Kildare (his Mothers brother) both of thoſe Kildares being Deputies of Ireland. From the bed of theſe Coſen-Gemanes, iſſued Con O-Neale, ſurnamed Bacco, becauſe he halted; who was ſo right Iriſh, that he curſed all his poſterity, in caſe they either learned the Engliſh language, ſowed wheate, or built them Houſes, leſt the firſt ſhould breed converſation, the ſecond Commerce of ſuſtenance, and with the laſt they ſhould ſpeed as the Crow, that buildeth her neſt to bee beaten out by the Hawke.

(39) But King Henry the eight, with whom was no dallying, ſetting his tallons faſt on Kildare, in whoſe rebellions O-Neale had engaged himſelfe deepe, ſo over-dares this envying Iriſh bird, that he flyes into England, ſues to the Eagle, renounceth the name of O-Neale, and puts his whole eſtate into the Kings hand. Whoſe humble ſubmiſſion ſo ſatisfied this crowned bird, that his life was delivered out of his claw, and letters Patents granted under the Great Seale of England, to hold his revenewes in Fee of the King, together with the Title of Earle of Tir-Oen, to him and to Matthew his falſe reputed ſon, and to the heires of their bodies lawfully begotten, at what time the ſaid Matthew was created Baron of Dungannon.

(40) Shan O-Neale, (with whom wee began) the eldeſt legitimate unto this Con-Bacco, ſeeing himſelfe diſherited, and a baſtard preferred before him, ſuddenly ſet his heart againſt his Father, as alſo againſt Matthew his high honoured and halfe-reputed brother, whom hee never left till hee had murthered, and purſued his Father with ſuch irreconcileable hatred, as he ſtript him out of Houſe and all, and never left, till for want and griefe, the old man pined away.

(41) Shan then choſen, proclaimed, and inaugured O-Neale, by an old ſhooe caſt over his head, ſeized upon his Fathers inheritance, and with all diligence fought after the ſonnes of Matthew, to ſecure himſelfe of that which he had got. Brian the eldeſt he cauſed to be ſlaine by Mac Donnel Totan, one of the Oneals race, but Hugh and Cormack by meanes of the Engliſh eſcaped his hands. Thus ſeated in Vlſter, hee began to tyrannize over the great men of that Province, accounting them his Subjects, as in his anſwers unto the Engliſh Iuſticiar, expoſtulating with him upon that point, he laid his Title.

Shan O-Neales title to Vlſter.

(42) That hee was the undoubted ſonne and heire of Con-Oneale, borne of his lawfull wife, and that of Matthew his ſuppoſed brother, was the ſonne of a Blackeſmith, borne in Dundalke, and unto the age of fifteene yeeres had beene ſo reputed and taken; that then he was obtruded upon Con, by the ſaid Smiths wife, whom he had formerly kept for his Concubine, with an intent to intervert the inheritance and honour of the O-Neale another way. That his ſurrender unto King Henry of England, was of no validity, conſidering that Con had no longer therein then his owne life, neither could that lawfully be done without the conſent of the Nobles of Vlſter, by whom he had beene elected O-Neale. That himſelfe was by Law both of God and man, the onely true Heire, being the firſt begotten ſonne of his Father, lawfully borne in Wedlocke, choſen, declared and proclaimed O-Neale, by the generall conſent of the Peeres and People of Vlſter, and that according to the ancient Law Taniſtry, whereby a man at his full yeeres is to be preferred before a boy, and an Uncle before a Nephew, whoſe Grandfather ſurvived the Father; and laſtly, that he had done nothing, but what he had ſufficient authority to doe, and which his anceſtors had not uſed before him to doe.

The Law Taniſtry in Ireland, what it is.

(43) His title thus pleaded and paſſed without oppoſition, hee preſently fell into other outrages; for O-Rayly hee overthrew in the Field, tooke Caileigh O-Donel Lord of Tir-Conel captive, caſt him and his children in priſon, carried away his wife, and in adultery begat baſtards upon her, ſeizing upon lands and goods at his pleaſure, and bare himſelfe as abſolute King of Vlſter.

Shan O-Neales outrages.

(44) Theſe his doings Thomas Earle of Suſſex (the Lord Deputy) ſought to redreſſe, whoſe preparations ſo ſtrangely terrified him, that by the counſell of Girald Earle of Kildare, he came into England, and caſt himſelfe proſtrate at Queene Elizabeths feet, and upon his ſubmiſſive behaviour and promiſed allegeance, with her gracious favour returned home, where for a while in his dyet and apparell, he conformed himſelfe to all kind of civility, yea, and did ſome office of ſervice in driving the Scots out of Vlſter, ſlaying their Leader Mac Conel, and in protecting the poorer ſort from the violence and oppreſſions of the Nobles. In which his doings hee drew upon himſelfe their hatreds and complaints; and he whoſe nature could digeſt neither, full furious for revenge upon Mac-Guir, Lord of Fermanagh, fired Armach, the Metropolitane City, laid ſiege unto Dundalke, and harried the Countrey on every ſide.

(45) Againſt whom Sir Henry Sidney, then Deputy of Ireland, came in perſon himſelfe into the Field: and Edward Randolph, a renowned Coronell, with ſeven Enſignes of Foot, and a Cornet of Horſemen, encamped at Derry by Logh-Foil, that ſo hee might charge the backe of the Rebell, which O-Neale well perceiving, haſted with his forces to remove: where Randolph in a pitcht field entred battell, and there manfully fighting with honour, loſt his life, but gave the O-Neale ſo great an overthrow, as never after he was able to make Head againſt his Soveraigne, and in many other Skirmiſhes was ſo foyled, as hee evidently ſaw his owne dreadfull downefall. Wherefore hee minded once more to ſue for the Queenes mercy, and with a halter about his necke, intended to humble himſelfe to the Lord Deputy, for his favour and mediation unto her Majeſty.

after a grievous diſtaſture of oppreſſion and warres, in which let us a while leave them, and returne to the affaires of England.

(47) The time now expired for retention of Callis ſo ſore thirſted after, and ſo thirſtingly kept; Queene Elizabeth preſently ſent unto Charles the French King, to demand the delivery according to covenants. Hee ſet in eſtate, accompanied with the Queene mother and others, the Engliſh Ambaſſadors had audience, and the Title controverſed among them as followeth. The Queenes Letters read, and attendance given what would more be ſaid: Sir Thomas Smith (for he was the man) demanded in Her Majeſties name, the Towne of Callis, the Forts, and other the appurtenances, the Caſtle, and Towne of Guine, and generally all ſuch Caſtles, Townes, and places as had beene taken by his Father Henry, the late French King in his laſt warres, from Mary late Queene of England, her Majeſties ſiſter: which in a Treaty of peace made at Caſteau in Cambrenſis the yeere of Chriſt 1559. was agreed upon, that his Soveraigne, Queene Elizabeth, ſhould permit the ſaid French King and his ſucceſſors to poſſeſſe, and peaceably to enjoy the ſaid Townes, Caſtles, and places, the ſpace of eight yeeres, and thoſe expired, the ſaid King Henry covenanted for himſelfe and ſucceſſors, to deliver the ſame intirely unto the Engliſh, which being compleat and ended, the ſecond of that preſent moneth Aprill, himſelfe with Sir Henry Norris her Majeſties Ambaſſadors; upon the third day of the ſame moneth, demanded in her name the poſſeſſion thereof accordingly, but could not attaine, or get ſpeech, either with Lieutenant, or Governour. Whereupon they were inforced to make repaire to his Majeſty, whom hee doubted not but would accompliſh the performance, and likewiſe keepe perpetuall amity with his Soveraigne Lady and Miſtreſſe.

The Townes Governours ſhould not be ſpoken with.

(48) King Charles but young, and altogether governed by the Queene mother, having well learned his leſſon, made preſent anſwer, That Callis was his, and that none had right thereunto but himſelfe, neither ſhould any deliver it to any other, and that the Treaty, named by the Engliſh Ambaſſador, did wholly geve it him. Whereunto Sir Thomas replyed, That neither Her Majeſty, nor Counſell did ſo take it, nor indeed could, the words of the Treaty being ſo plaine, and manifeſt. Why, Maſter Smith, quoth the Queene-mother, I marvell the Queene your Miſtreſſe would now ſend for ſuch a purpoſe, and eſpecially you, who knoweth none better, how all things paſſed: you know that your Queene hath forfeited Callis, and all her rights in thoſe places divers wayes. As firſt by invading the Kings Subjects in Scotland, then moſt manifeſtly at New-haven, where the King, my Sonne, was faine with an whole Army to recover it; and in the ſaid Treaty was an Article as hath been diſputed, that if the Queene of England ſhould invade any part of my Sonnes Dominions, ſhee ſhould forth-with loſe her right in Callis.

King Charles ſpeech to the Ambaſſadors.

Objections againſt the Queene of England.

(49) Madam, ſaid Sir Thomas: King Henry and his ſucceſſors were bound to loſe Callis, if they invaded England, and yet did King Francis, brother to the King here, doe it by the way of Scotland, as is moſt manifeſt, after the ſaid Treaty at Caſteau, not onely in aſſuming the Armes and Title of England and Ireland, but contrary to the Articles of Peace, which concluded that both Engliſh and French ſhould depart Scotland: which incontinently her Majeſty performed, in revoking thence her Lieutenant, Captaines, and Soudiers: whereas contrariwiſe Monſieur D'oiſell their Chiefeaine abode therein ſtill, and the French power daily augmented under the conduct of Monſieur de Martigues, and de-la-Broſſe, and alſo by another great Commander, whoſe Navy was diſperſed by tempeſt, and whoſe ſtrength his ſhipwracke did teſtifie, in Holland, Zeland, Norway, and Denmarke, by the loſſe of Armour, Men, and Munition: to let paſſe * Britaigne and Normandy, then in preparing to invade England; and Lantzknights likewiſe hired in Saxony, and the Land of Lunnenburge to aſſiſt the French in that enterpriſe, when theſe Almans according to their nature loath to take Seas, and deſirous to know whither their ſervice intended, were told, they ſhould no further then Scotland; and to the Land adjoyning, which was plentifull of gold, ſilver, and all kind of wealth, and where no Alman Souldier had made ſpoile for the ſpace of an hundred yeeres before, and to ſome of them in plaine termes it was told, that they ſhould into England; which was likewiſe ſignified unto her Majeſty, both from her neighbour Princes, warning her Highneſſe to take good heed unto Her ſelfe, as alſo by letters intercepted, that declared their intents, whereof ſhee did not onely admoniſh Monſieur de Seure then Ambaſſador in England for France, but alſo by her Ambaſſador to the French King, praying him to deſiſt from ſuch attempts ſo prejudiciall to her Highneſſe, and ſo directly againſt the treaty of Peace. To colour which matter, the ſaid de Seure made a Proteſtation in Print, the anſwer whereunto is likewiſe printed in Engliſh, French, Italian, and Latine, wherein many appeare the Hiſtory of that time. And ſince Her Majeſty hath had a more manifeſt proofe by men which are yet alive. For when the moſt part of the French power was arrived in Scotland, the Queene-Mother Mouſieur de Oſſell, and Mouſieur de Martigues, called the Scotiſh Lords with their Forces unto Aimouth, beſides Barwicke; where they declared, that their minde was to invade England; and to give to the King and Queene the poſſeſſion of the Engliſh Crown of which they now had the Titles and Armories. But the Lords of Scotland upon conſultation, made anſwer, That they had often attempted to invade England, but they never got any good thereby; further affirming, it was againſt the peace newly concluded and ſworne: ſo neere was it to execution. Vpon this there followed a treaty of peace at Edenborough, wherein the number of French Souldiers were to bee leſſened; the Stile and Armes of England left downe, and the treaty of Caſteau renewed and confirmed: all which may appeare by the hands of them which were Commiſſioners, authorized by the French King under his Great Seale: which teaty when it was ſigned with all the Commiſſioners hands, the Queene my Soveraigne for the love of peace, being contented to ſeale and ſweare; the ſaid King Francis did refuſe them both, ſith which refuſall Her Majeſty doth, and hath alwayes taken that the right of Callis, both propriety and poſſeſſion, was devolued unto her by reaſon of the attempt, and hath demanded it divers times, yet was content to ſtay the time of compoſition; which now being cleerely expired, it muſt needs be hers, and cannot juſtly be denied.

(50) Why (ſaid the Queene) all this while you have ſaid nothing againſt the King my Sonne, why hee ſhould forfeit it: he hath done nothing: and is the bearing of your Armes ſo great a matter with you? you beare the Armes and ſtile of Ours, and ſo doe many beare others Armes alſo. No Madam, ſaid Sir Thomas Smith, the bearing of the Armes is not ſo great a matter, but that with other things doe declare the intent, and the attempt maketh the right forfeited by the treaty. And though the King your ſonne did not forfeit it, yet the right being once loſt from France, and accrewed to the Queene of England, how ſhould it goe from her againe? All this while (ſaid the Queene Mother) you ſpeake but of the King of Scotland, who did it in his Wives right, and there you muſt aske your amends, and not here; you here what my Sonne ſaith, and every man ſeeth the right is his, your Queene hath forfeited it, and therefore I marvell my good ſiſter will ſtand in it, or ſend to demand it. This is the anſwer, ſaid Sir Thomas, which I ſhall carry to the Queene my Soveraigne. The cauſe for Callis debated before the French King & his Councell.

(51) The King ſet in Counſell with the Queene Mother, the Dukes of Anion, Alanſon, Monpencier, Aumale, and Nevers, the Cardinals of Bourion and Chaſtillon, the Biſhops of Orleance and Lymoges, Monſieur de Valence & others, the ambaſſadors of England were placed in the middeſt: unto whom the Queene ſpake and ſaid, Monſieur L' Ambaſſador, I pray you ſay your minde before the King and his Councell here aſſembled: which Sir Thomas Smith preſently did in the ſame forme as he had done before, adding with all, that this demand was grounded upon the lapſe of the time, by which without all controverſie after eight yeares Callis was due to the Queene of England, and that by right, both the proprietie, and the poſſeſſion thereof was inveſted unto her long age, by the forfeiture made by the attempt in Scotland, by the commandement and conſent of Francis the ſecond to invade England, ſeeing the King did not ratifie the treatie made at Edenborough.

Monſieur de Valence ſaid the Queene Mother, I pray you anſwer that, whereupon he ſtanding up ſaid, my ſelfe was ſent to that treatie of peace, and am glad to heare Monſieur L' Ambaſſador confeſſe that the hearing of the Engliſh Armories was but a ſmall matter, and yet was that the chiefeſt thing imputed by their ſide, as for the men of warre, they were not above five thouſand at the moſt, ſent indeed becauſe of a rebellion (for ſo muſt I terme it in plaine termes) then riſen there. But the Engliſhmen were above fifteene thouſand that came againſt them at Petty-Lith. There was ſent thither alſo the Biſhop of Amiens with the Popes Bulles to reduce them againe to the Religion Romane. And as touching theſe matters I ſpake with your Queene as I came through England, and offered her as much at the firſt as was done in that Treaty, if ſhee would breake the League betwixt her and the Scotiſh Lords, which were Rebels. But ſhee ſaid ſhee could not. Now for the ratification and confirmation of that Treaty which was ſigned with my hand and others: there ſhould have come into France certaine Scotiſh Lords to have agreed and ſworne to certaine Articles, which did deferre to come till the King was ſore ſicke, and could not attend them, who ſhortly after died and ſo the Treaty was not ratified. And hee being dead, the King that now is, had nothing to doe to ratifie it: for the matters therein touched Scotland, and their Queens doings and titles, which appertained nothing at all unto him.

(53) To whom Sir Thomas replied and ſaid, I am not ignorant that the Article ſaith, Armis inovare, attentare aut moliri, and doe not take Armis to ſignifie Armories. But the Armes that I meant to weigh the moſt, and the attempt with them done was the Armed men, as the good Captaines whom I named D' Oiſel, Broſſe, Martignes, and others, their Enſignes and Companies, marry the Armories and Titles did diſcloſe the intent and meaning. And if there had beene none other but them which the Biſhop brought, and none other munition but the Popes Bulles; Queene Elizabeth ſhould not have needed to have armed ſo many ſhips, nor ſent ſo many Souldiers to have let their enterpriſe, nor would ever have complained of it: but it was farre otherwiſe as I have declared. As for the league you ſpeake of with the Rebels of Scotland, I thinke there was none, and the event did ſhew what Rebels they were. But this I thinke, they were as weary to have ſo many of you there, as we were as weary to have you ſo neare us. And therein I thinke the Queenes Majeſty and they did agree. And to excuſe the refuſe of the ratification, by the not comming in for the Scotiſh Lords, hath ſmall reaſon to beare it: ſo the Treatie made betwixt the French King then, and the Queene of England, might have beene ratified notwithſtanding, whatſoever was betwixt him and the Scotiſh Lords his Subject: for our fact and peace did not ſtand upon their doings, which Treaty becauſe it was not ratified, I ſay, the Queene my Soveraignes title to the poſſeſſion of Callis, by reaſon of that attempt, ſtandeth whole and entire unto her. But ſir ſaid he (ſpeaking to the King) to ſay the truth I have no commiſſions, nor any commandement or authoritie to diſpute or anſwer in theſe matters, but onely to demand Callis and the other Fortreſſes, and places according to the Treaty, which is ſo plaine, that to mine opinion, there need be no controverſie. And if there be any doubt, now the time expired doth put it out of all doubt. But becauſe you and the Queene have charged mee that I know ſo much of the matter, as I cannot deny ſomewhat I doe, as having beene at the doing of a great deale and the diſpute; Somewhat I muſt, and may ſay for my ſelfe, leſt it ſhould be thought that there were nothing to be ſaid. Marry as I ſaid, as Commiſſioner from the Queene my Soveraigne, I have nothing to ſay, but the demands onely, the matter being plaine and in the right judgement, without controverſie, and alſo that I ſee no perſon here but ſuch as be parties, and no competent perſon to be Iudge of the controverſie. Whereunto the Conſtable replied and ſaid, Who ſhould be Iudge of that which is the Kings but himſelfe? it is his, and none could take or give it to any other but himſelfe: With that the Queene Mother asked Monſieur Chancelier, Why he did not ſpeake.

Queene Mother.

(54) Who after ſome pauſe, began a long and well compoſed Oration, the ſum whereof was this: That the preſent Kings right to Callis was long before any claime could be made thereunto by the Engliſh, which was not much above two hundred yeares, and then was it got by the fortune of warre; but more anciently, that it had beene the inheritance of France none can deny, as being upon the Continent thereof, and not upon any Engliſh ground. King Edward (quoth he) wee grant won it, and your father (noble King) rewan it to his Crowne. But the Engliſh will ſay they have poſſeſſed and enjoyed it many yeares: Why ſo they did Aquitaine, Caſcoigne, and Guyen, and other dominions beſides, which they claimed by our Elianor, the repuduate of the King of Franſe, who was inheritrix unto it: indeed ſome titles they had, yet ſo as they held them of the Crowne of France: for the whole, which is Gallia, appertaineth to you for our King: and ſo doth Callis which is of no great antiquitie that I can reade of: for Countie Bologne was the firſt that did incloſe it, being afore but a Burgard, as the moſt part of the Townes of France then were. At the buſtell of Creſſy, dolorous to us, King Edward of England after nine moneths ſiege, by compoſition had it ſurrendred, the poore inhabitants pardoned of life at the great ſuit of his good Queene, elſe had they driven every mothers ſonne, and ſo with white wants in their hands were expelled the towne: To whom the King of France was ſo mercifull, that hee commanded of every thing wacant, they ſhould be the firſt provided for. And I thinke when your Father King Henry tooke it, the Engliſh were likewiſe ſo ſerved. Theſe claime two hundred yeares poſſeſſion, the others before them, above five hundred yeares: thus God doth to puniſh, or to eſſay his ſervants. And although the Engliſh claimed Caſcoigne, and Guyen, by ſucceſſion of Elianor, although Normandy by one William: and Poyctier by a Dowry of their mother, daughter of Philip *de Bell: yet to Callis they had no right, but onely by Armes, and by Armes your Father againe recovered it. But ſome will ſay, by the peace at Bretigny, they have right; I ſay no; for every man knowes what exceptions were taken at that peace: and ſome, that ſo long a poſſeſſion makes a preſcription; I ſay no, for Preſcription is among private men, but among Princes, preſcription cannot ſtand, and yet theirs was not much above two hundred, ours above eight hundred yeares. But to you Monſieur L' Ambaſſadour, I will ſay, that at the peace of Troes in Champaigne, where your ſelfe and Monſieur Throckmorton, both of you moſt able in ſuch affaires and nothing therein done, I doubt not without the Queene and Councels conſent: no one word was ſpoken of Callis, which chiefly was the cauſe of the warre; ſo that all ſtandeth cleare for all which was then talked upon, and is a plaine confeſſion, that they did acquit their right thereunto. after a grievous distasture of oppression and warres, in which let us a while leave them, and returne to the affaires of England.

(47) The time now expired for retention of Callis so fore thirsted after, and so thirstingly kept; Queene Elizabeth presently sent unto Charles the French King, to demand the delivery according to covenants. Hee set in estate, accompanied with the Queene mother and others, the English Ambassadors had audience, and the Title controverfed among them as followeth. The Queenes Letters read, and attendance given what would more be said: Sir Thomas Smith (for he was the man) demanded in Her Majesties name, the Towne of Callis, the Forts, and other the appurtenances, the Castle, and Towne of Guize, and generally all such Castles, Townes, and places as had beene taken by his Father Henry, the late French King in his last warres, from Mary late Queene of England, her Majesties sister: which in a Treaty of peace made at Casteau in Cambrensis the yeere of Christ 1559. was agreed upon, that his Soveraigne, Queene Elizabeth, should permit the said French King and his successors to possesse, and peaceably to enjoy the said Townes, Castles, and places, the space of eight yeeres, and those expired, the said King Henry covenanted for himselfe and successors, to deliver the same intirely unto the English, which being compleat and ended, the second of that present moneth Aprill, himselfe with Sir Henry Norris her Majesties Ambassadors, upon the third day of the same moneth, demanded in her name the possession thereof accordingly, but could not attaine, or get speech, either with Lieutenant, or Governour. Whereupon they were inforced to make repaire to his Majesty, whom hee doubted not but would accomplish the performance, and likewise keepe perpetuall amity with his Soveraigne Lady and Mistresse.

The Townes Governours whould not be spoken with.

(48) King Charles but young, and altogether governed by the Queene mother, having well learned his lesson, made present answer, That Callis was his, and that none had right thereunto but himselfe, neither should any deliver it to any other, and that the Treaty, named by the English Ambassador, did wholly give it him. Whereunto Sir Thomas replyed, That neither Her Majesty, nor Counsell did so take it, nor indeed could, the words of the Treaty being so plaine, and manifest. Why, Master Smith, quoth the Queene-mother, I marvell the Queene your Mistresse would now send for such a purpose, and especially you, who knoweth none better, how all things passed: you know that your Queene hath forfeited Callis, and all her rights in those places divers wayes. As first by invading the Kings Subjects in Scotland, then most manifestly at New-haven, where the King, my Sonne was faine with an whole Army to recover it; and in the said Treaty was an Article as hath been disputed, that if the Queene of England should invade any part of my Sonnes Dominions, shee should forth-with lose her right in Callis.

King Charles speech to the Ambassadors.

Objections against the Queene of England.

(49) Madam, said Sir Thomas: King Henry and his successors were bound to lose Callis, if they invaded England, and yet did King Francis, brother to the King here, doe it by the way of Scotland, as is most manifest, after the said Treaty at Casteau, not onely in assuming the Armes and Title of England and Ireland, but contrary to the Articles of Peace, which concluded that both English and French should depart Scotland: which incontinently her Majesty performed, in revoking thence her Lieutenant, Captaines, and Souldiers: whereas contrariwise Monsieur D'oisell their Chiefe raine abode therein still, and the French power daily augmented under the conduct of Monsieur de Martigues, and de-la-Brosse, and also by another great Commander, whose Navy was dispersed by tempest, and whose strength his shipwracke did testifie, in Holland, Zeland, Norway, and Denmarke, by the losse of Armour, Men, and Munition: to let passe * Britaigne and Normandy, then in preparing to invade England; and Lantzknights likewise hired in Saxony, and the Land of Lunnenburge to assist the French in that enterprise, when these Almans according to their nature loath to take Seas, and desirous to know whither their service intended, were told, they should no further then Scotland, and to the Land adjoyning, which was plentifull of gold, silver, and all kind of wealth, and where no Alman Souldier had made spoile for the space of an hundred yeeres before, and to some of them in plaine termes it was told, that they should into England; which was likewise signified unto her Majesty, both from her neighbour Princes, warning her Highnesse to take good heed unto Her selfe, as also by letters intercepted, that declared their intents, whereof shee did not onely admonish Monsieur de Seure then Ambassador in England for France; but also by her Ambassador to the French King, praying him to desist from such attempts so prejudiciall to her Highnesse, and so directly against the treaty of Peace. To colour which matter, the said de Seure made a Protestation in Print, the answer whereunto is likewise printed in English, French, Italian, and Latine, wherein many appeare the Hiftory of that time. And since Her Majesty hath had a more manifest proofe by men which are yet alive. For when the most part of the French power was arrived in Scotland, the Queene-Mother Monsieur de Oisell, and Monsieur de Martigues, called the Scotish Lords with their Forces unto Aimouth, besides Barwicke; where they declared, that their minde was to invade England; and to give to the King and Queene the possession of the English Crown of which they now had the Titles and Armories. But the Lords of Scotland upon consultation, made answer, That they had often attempred to invade England, but they never got any good thereby; further affirming, it was against the peace newly concluded and sworne: so neere was it to execution. Vpon this there followed a treaty of peace at Edenborough, wherein the number of French Souldiers were to bee lessened; the Stile and Armes of England left downe, and the treaty of Casteau renewed and confirmed: all which may appeare by the hands of them which were Commissioners, authorized by the French King under his Great Seale: which teaty when it was signed with all the Commissioners hands, the Queene my Soveraigne for the love of peace, being contented to seale and sweare; the said King Francis did refuse them both, sith which refusall Her Majesty doth, and hath alwayes taken that the right of Callis, both propriety and possession, was devolued unto her by reason of the attempt, and hath demanded it divers times, yet was content to stay the time of compositions; which now being clearely expired, it must needs be hers, and cannot justly be denied.

The cause for Callis debated before the French King & his Councell.

(51) The King set in Counsell with the Queene Mother, the Dukes of Anion, Alanson, Monpencier, Aumale, and Nevers, the Cardinals of Bourton and Chastillon, the Bishops of Orleance and Lymoges, Monsieur de Valence & others, the ambassadors of England were placed in the middest: unto whom the Queene spake and said, Monsieur L' Ambassador, I pray you say your minde before the King and his Councell here assembled: which Sir Thomas Smith presently did in the same forme as he had done before, adding with all, that this demand was grounded upon the lapse of the time, by which without all controversie after eight yeares Callis was due to the Queene of England, and that by right, both the proprietie, and the possession thereof was invested unto her long age, by the forfeiture made by the attempt in Scotland, by the commandement and consent of Francis the second to invade England, seeing the King did not ratifie the treatie made at Edenborough.

Monsieur d' Valence said the Queene Mother, I pray you answer that, whereupon he standing up said, my selfe was sent to that treatie of peace, and am glad to heare Monsieur L' Ambassador confesse that the bearing of the English Armories was but a small matter, and yet was that the chiefest thing imputed by their side, as for the men of warre, they were not above five thousand at the most, sent indeed because of a rebellion (for so must I terme it in plaine termes) then risen there. But the Englishmen were above fifteene thousand that came against them at Petty-Linh. There was sent thither also the Bishop of Amiens with the Popes Bulles to reduce them againe to the Religion Romane. And as touching these matters I spake with your Queene as I came through England, and offered her as much at the first as was done in that Treaty, if shee would breake the League betwixt her and the Scotish Lords, which were Rebels. But shee said shee could not. Now for the ratification and confirmation of that Treaty which was signed with my hand and others: there should have come into France certaine Scotish Lords to have agreed and sworne to certaine Articles, which did deferre to come till the King was fore sicke, and could not attend them, who shortly after died and so the Treaty was not ratified. And he being dead, the King that now is, had nothing to doe to ratifie it: for the matters therein touched Scotland, and their Queens doings and titles, which appertained nothing at all unto him.

Sir Tho. Smith:

(53) To whom Sir Thomas replied and said, I am not ignorant that the Article saith, Armis innovare, attentare aut moliri, and doe not take Armis to signifie Armories. But the Armes that I meant to weigh the most, and the attempt with them done was the Armed men, as the good Captaines whom I named D' Oisel, Brosse, Martignes, and others, their Enfignes and Companies, marry the Armories and Titles did disclose the intent and meaning. And if there had beene none other but them which the Bishop brought, and none other munition but the Popes Bulles; Queene Elizabeth should not have needed to have armed so many Ships, nor sent so many Souldiers to have let their enterprise, nor would ever have complained of it: but it was farre otherwise as I have declared. As for the league you speake of with the Rebels of Scotland, I thinke there was none, and the event did shew what Rebels they were. But this I thinke, they were as weary to have so many of you there, as we were as weary to have you so neare us. And therein I thinke the Queenes Majesty and they did agree. And to excuse the refuse of the ratification, by the not comming in for the Scotish Lords, hath small reason to beare it: so the Treatie made betwixt the French King then, and the Queene of England, might have beene ratified notwithstanding, whatsoever was betwixt him and the Scotish Lords his Subject: for our fact and peace did not stand upon their doings, which Treaty because it was not ratified, I say, the Queene my Soveraignes title to the possession of Callis, by reason of that attempt, standeth whole and entire unto her. But sir faid he (speaking to the King) to say the truth I have no commissions, nor any commandement or authoritie to dispute or answer in these matters, but onely to demand Callis and the other Fortresses, and places according to the Treaty, which is so plaine, that to mine opinion, there need be no controversie. And if there be any doubt, now the time expired doth put it out of all doubt. But because you and the Queene have charged mee that I know so much of the matter, as I cannot deny somewhat I doe, as having beene at the doing of a great deale and the dispute; Somewhat I must, and may say for my selfe, lest it should be thought that there were nothing to be said. Marry as I said, as Commissioner from the Queene my Soveraigne, I have nothing to say, but the demands onely, the matter being plaine and in the right judgement, without controversie, and also that I see no person here but such as be parties, and no competent person to be Iudge of the controversie. Whereunto the Constable replied and said, Who should be Iudge of that which is the Kings but himselfe? it is his, and none that the Queene Mother asked Monsieur Chancelier, Why he did not speake.

because all small things cannot bee mentioned in conference. But Callis was the chiefe point, which being omitted, I say by meaning it was acquitted. But now to your reasons Monsieur L'ambassador; the Article for the losse of Callis at that treatie was forced in by you the English, who of all nations bee the most wary, and circumspect in making their peaces. Whereupon the Queene of England, layeth to us a suspition, a jealousie, a conjecture, a guesse, that a King of France would have invaded England. But every suspition must not make a breache: for so whensoever any Prince should Arme his men upon just occasion, his neighbours might say it was against him. And so doe you English lay guesses against the late King Francis the second. But the Queene of England with open face invaded the Kings Realme, with a goodly pretence to keepe the townes to the Kings use, yet when all was reduced into their due obedience, shee would keepe the towne of Newhaven as a pledge for Callis, by which deed shee hath lost all her right in Callis, God indeed hath made a naturall separation betwixt you and us, a sure wall of defence, Et penitus toto divisos orbe Britannos: So that naturally you ought to have nothing but peace and amitie with ours. But doe not thinke Monsieur L' Ambassador that I say this as fearing what you can doe, for there was never any King of France since Charlemaigne so great as the King is now, had so many men of warre, so ready, and so good Souldiers: and yet his Highnesse doth desire the amitie of the Queene of England, and the love of that nation: of which there is the more hope if all these prestences and demands were cancelled, and Callis forgotten, which hath beene the continuall picke-quarrell betwixt these two Realmes. You never read Monsieur Smith, that the French ever invaded England, I speake it not to your dispraise which are English, but to your praise; yet this I thinke, had there not beene so easie a descent, so convenient a place, and so ready, for you to make warre here, yeewould not (as I suppose) have come hither so often and troubled our Country, nor the amitie betwixt you and us; And I dare boldly affirme and gage any thing, that the Queene of England shall gaine more by continuall peace with us, then shee shall due by Callis, and therefore your Queene must leave off these demands, and quarrels, and come to a perfect peace with us, which shall be more profitable for both the Realmes: and this I dare assure you, here is no Councellor among us that dare once open his mouth to render you Callis, for my part, I will not be one to move or assent thereunto. Nor I, said the Constable, and so all the rest.

The French haue rather made faults then lee faults.

A faire shew to feare the English.

Callis a continuall pick-quarrell.

The Constable.

(55) Then quoth Sir Thomas Smith, Monsieur Chancelier, mee thinkes you fetch your Title very farre to have Callis, and howsoever the possession, was come by, by and by the right is his in possession, then by your reason all our disputation is in vaine, and it maketh no matter, bonâne an mala fide possideat, the King once in possession, as a thing returning to his primer estate postliminio or gotten of the enemy, yee admit no contract, or latter treatie, so as it doth appeare, yee upon that which was thought of some men, and alwaies spoken, that what promise soever was made, the French would never render Callis againe to the English, but keepe it still, per jus, nefasque: this reasoning passeth all answer, for whatsoever the Queene of England had done quàm Sanctè, how ever she had kept her treaty of this eight yeares, though ye could object nothing against her, yet shee should never have had Callis restored; to this kinde of reasoning and to that, that no man dare moove the King to render it being due, I cannot answer; but to this that toucheth my fact in the making of the Peace in Champaigne, where I must confesse, and am not ashamed, that was a Minister, I doe not yet acknowledge that either I am worthy to bee accounted so wise as you would make mee, nor our Nations always so circumspect in making Treatises with you your owne Writers averring otherwise, and give you the praise therein against us. But for the point wherein you touch us, that the peace at Troes should bee novatio contractus, and wee should thereby acquit our right of Callis, it is Antistrophon, and turneth a great deale better upon you. For if because our talke was of our right to Callis, by reason of the attempt in Scotland, you of the forfeiture of it by reason of the descent to Newhaven, neither condiscending to other, and not concluding thereupon, we did agree upon that Peace. And if that Peace, doth make novationem, then the forfeiture of our right by keeping Newhaven, which you impute to us, is wiped away, novated and cleansed by this Peace, and our right which was not yet in esse, & cujus dies nondum venit, remaineth still. So as it toucheth you rather then us, and by this meanes have you nothing to say against us, but we still our right against you. But the truth is, as Monsieur Le Connestable here can tell, who was partly the occasion that we came to it; for when this was contended, that Callis was already due unto us, you, that we had forfeited it, so that we could enter into no other Article of peace, why said you; have not wee the wit to make a peace, and make no mention of Callis? neither to speake of it one way, nor other: your times not yet come to aske it, let us live in peace in the meane while, and each Prince have right such as it is, reserved; whereupon you Monsieur le Ambespine vvere one of the first that came with us, and you know what passed.

Sir Tho. Smith.

The French cause that Callis was not mentioned in the peace.

(56) Tea (saith he) but we would never grant that it should be put in, that you should have Callis: you say true (said Sir Thomas) nor wee that the Queenes Majesty should acquit it, nor the hostages neither. But in the end when it came to the Conclusion, as the Bishop of Orleans, and Monsieur Bourdin can tell, it was agreed, that expreslly the right be reserved, aswell to that, as to any other thing, not expressely there mentioned: Omnes alia petitiones & demand & familiter exceptiones, & defensiones as appareth by the Treaty. And as touching Newhaven, Monsieur Chancelier, note in it two things. The one the first entry, the other, the keeping after the peace agreed upon amongst your selves. As for the first entry, I deny that our men of warre made any invasion or came by force. But being requested and desired aide of a great number of Noblemen, and other who were in perill and danger. And whether did they like invaders (I aske for all the time that they were not assailed) spoile any, or robbe any; no, they tooke not an henne or an egge, but they paid for it: I, if any complaine I offer to pay it: This is no invasion, nor no hostilitie: but the act of a friend, and at their requests and pursuits, whose doings sir, aswell for matter of Armes, as for other things done in that tumult, you have declared by Edict to have beene done à bon fin et pour vostre service, which may truly be said, for by their meanes and defence, a great number of your good Subjects aswell men as women, aswell Captaines as Souldiers of whom Monsieur le Chancelier did now boast, as of other not Souldiers, are saved now to doe you service, which else should have beene a prey and spoile to them which sought but the ruine of halfe, or third part at the least of your Realme. For the conservation of whom, yee in part may thanke the Queene my Mistresse. And this for the first descent of our men. Now where Monsieur Chancellier saith, that the Queene my Mistresse changed her pretence, I still doe say shee kept her first protestation. That shee would appropriate no Land Towne, nor Fortresse of the Kings to her, nor shee did never claime Newhaven as hers, but comming peaceably into it, having beene at great charge and cost, it was both wildome and reason all other being satisfied and content, shee should at the least have some reason offered her in her right to Callis. And otherwise she did not hold Newhaven, which thing was manifestly declared at Gallion, where Articles were drawne not unreasonable, and the matter so farre forward, that they were signed with my hand, and tarried but for power and Commission to affirme them. But the mortalitie and pestilence growing so great in Newhaven

Newhaven, gave too much advantage, which was taken; and the reasonable dealings in this matter broke off; other meaning her Majesty had none.

(57) No said the Constable, what meant such preparation, and provision? I cannot skill of things; but in that Art wherein I have beene brought up and exercised all my life, I can skill a little. There was such a number of Horse harnesse for the Cart: such a number of Artillery, such provisions of Gammons of Bacon, Cheese and other things, and above five thousand men, that I am sure went out of it, besides all those that were dead; can you make mee beleeve that all this was for Newhaven alone? No Monsieur (said hee) I know what belongeth to a Towne of Warre. Tea, said another, and the Ships also that came. Nay said the Constable they came to late. Why, said the Queene-mother smiling, will you make us beleeve that all that preparation was for Newhaven alone?

The King of Scotland barbarously murthered.

The Queene of Scotland oppressed by her owne Subjects.

(58) Wilsedome would, Madam, quoth Sir Thomas Smith, because the sea and winde doe not serve at all times, that there should be good store for all manner of provision. No, no, (said she) there was a further meaning, but as you have quitted Newhaven, so must you quit Callis, and let us be friends; never talke more of these demands, nor of the sums of money for which he had Hostages. All is gone from you quite. Your Queene in comming to Newhaven, hath quitted all. Shee must forget that matter cleane, and let us be friends still. The King my sonne doth offer as much friendship as need to bee, but as for Callis, ye must never speake of it. It is hard, Madam, said Sir Thomas Smith, for a man to forget his right, or not to remember a wrong offered. Nay; no wrong said she; you have heard what Monsieur Le Chancellier hath said, and what all these of my sonnes Counsell doe say. Madam (quoth hee) it is for the most part seene that men be partiall in their owne causes, I doe assure you, that the Queene my Soveraigne doth thinke that shee hath as good right to Callis as to any Towne in England: and so doe all her Counsell: and whatsoever yee have heard, I am able to say for her right even out of hand, but they a great deale more. But Sir, quoth Sir Thomas, is this finall answer I shall have? Tea said the King, That yee will not render Callis unto her Majesty according to the Treaty, nor pay the five hundred thousand Crownes which is for the peine.

Queene Mary of Scotland arriues in England.

Queene Elizabeth hollisteth the Scots in her behalfe. Buchan. lib. 19.

(59) No, said the King, I will keepe them both according to the Treaty: well then said Sir Thomas I have no more to say, but to bring this report to Her Majesty, which I shall bee sorry to doe: and thereupon himselfe, and Sir Henry Norris, rose up to depart, doing their obeisance. But you take not your leave, Monsieur L'ambassadors for altogether said the Queene. Yes forsooth said Sir Thomas. Doe you intend to come no more at court? No Madam, except the Kings Majesty doe command me. But I am sorry to carry this answer so precise; and that there is so little regard of the Queene my Soveraignes right. No right said the Queene for if there were any, the King my sonne would be loth to offer her any wrong: yee have heard all the reasons, I marvell that you will take upon you, you that are learned to defend so unjust a cause. Ah Madam (said hee) I see well, it is true on your part, that men bee blinde in their owne causes and advantages. Surely (quoth shee) the Queene (my good sister) shall have more advantage thus as it is, then to demand Callis. And I pray you persuade her. I Madam, against her right? You must not say so, I pray you commend me heartily to the Queene, my good sister, and desire her to keepe the amity and love which is betwixt her and my sonne, and I shall bee ready to doe her what service or pleasure I can, quoth the Queene: and so said the King. Thus this conference ended, and Callis kept still by the French.

The Earles of Northumberland and Westmorland in Rebellion.

(60) Now as these distastures fell betwixt England and France, and these broken Covenants ministred occasions to set each against others: So at the same time, the affaires of Scotland was carried with so violent a motion as set the Lords at dissentions, and the land in civill sedition, so as not onely outrages were committed upon the best Subjects, but even upon the vertuous King and Queene themselves, him they shamefully murthered in a most barbarous manner, and her they tooke prisoner, forced her to resigne government, and lastly to flye into forraine parts for succour. But knowing that this Subject is to be writ with a farre more noble pen, and our extant relations from uncertainety and suspected reports, we will surcease to intermeddle in the particulars of that Queenes affaires, excepting onely in such etercourses of State, as are woven in ours, and cannot otherwise be avoyded without maime of History; this onely in generall.

Mortoun a Papisticall Priest advanceth the Rebellion with Papall Bulles.

An. Dom. 1569. The Earle of Northumberland sent for to the Court, disobeyeth him selfe.

(61) Mary Queene of Scotland having imbarked her selfe for France, where shee well hoped to finde many friends: by contrary windes (accompanyed with sixteene pertsons) landed at Workinton in Cumberland, and from thence was conveyed to Carlile, to Bolton Castle, and lastly to the custody of the Earle of Shrewsbury. Whose troubles and misfortune, Q. Elizabeth both pittied and sought to redresse, writing in her behalfe unto the Regent of Scotland, and blaming the Lords of the many wrongs done to their Queene, which indeed were intollerable to royall authority, and such, as other Princes could not but seeke to redresse, and revenge; notwithstanding such was the distasture of those distempered Lords; or the frownes of those fatall times, that in England shee remained ever after during her life.

Nove. 14.

(62) As the jelousies grew great betwixt these two great Queenes Elizabeth and Mary, by the working instruments of the Pope, and forraine Princes; so by the like meanes, were the like discontenes bred and nourished in some of the greatest English Peeres towards their Soveraigne, whose Peace, under pretext of Religion, they irreligiously disturbed. Among these, the first in ranke, time and disloyalty, were the two Earles of Northumberland and Westmorland, who with Leonard Dacres, Nevil, Norton Tempest, Danby, and others, purposed on the sudden to have surprized the Earle of Suffex, the Queenes Lieutenant of the North in his house at Cawood; but therein prevented, they were enforced to keepe secret their intents, till some fit occasion should chance to bee ministred. They had in readinesse against the rising certaine English Priests, Morton and others, with Bulles and instruments of absolution, reconciliation, and taking of Oathes to the Pope and his doctrine, which was not so secretly done, but that Queene Elizabeths vigilant Counsellors had an inkling thereof.

(63) Thomas Piercy; (so was Northumberlands Earle named) lying at his Castle of Topcliffe in Yorkeshire, had gone so farre in his intended purposes, as hee could not returne; who being sent for unto the Court, strucke great amazement and sudden feare into the other conspirators hearts: and his owne guilty minde was much more distracted, upon notice that some forces were approching for his apprehension; whereupon all affrighted, he rose from his bed, and caused the Bels to bee rung in a most confused manner, so that the Townesmen raised, all sought to defend and follow him their chiefe Lord.

(64) The nest thus broken before the birds could well flye, he departed to Branspeth, where hee met with Charles Nevill Earle of Westmorland, and his following consorts; who joyning in Councell, made no conscience to undoe many true subjects, and innocent men: For abusing the Queenes name in their Proclamations and Commissions, they commanded the Countrey to follow them in Armes; sometimes pretending the safety of Her Majesties person in danger (they said) by Treasons in worshoring their former Religion, which if themselves should neglect, other forraigne Princes (said they) would doe, to the no little perill of the Realme.

The pretences of the Rebels.

(65) In this zeale they hasted to Durham, with as forward an intent as Ieroboam did to Bethel, to set up up his golden Calves, where they rent and tare the Bible, in as great a contempt, as Ioachim did the rowle that Ieremy wrote: at Darington they besprinkled their host with holy water, for feare of spirits, and at Rippon heard Masse, to forward their Treason, with the assistance of that Propitiatory Sacrifice. Whence, with Banners displayed, they entred Borow-brigge, old Norton being their Ancient, whose Ensigne was the Crosse, and five wounds of our Lord.

The strength of the Popish Rebels.

(66) From thence they went to Tadcaster, Wetherby, and Bramham Moore, where they mustered sixteene hundred Horsemen, and foure thousand footmen, intending therewith to march unto Yorke. But their minds altering, they fell upon Barnards Castle, which after eleven dayes resistance, was yeelded unto them: which fortunate entrance did so animate their rebellious conceits, as that in their letters sent to their favourers, they daigned their Soveraigne no better stile, then Elizabeth the late Queene, pretended Queene, and no Queene indeed: as likewise did the Countesse of Northumberland in her Letter sent unto Stuckley, and * others of the faction, in farre worse termes.

The Rebels faincinelie towards their Soveraigne. M. S. of Parliament. * The Duchesse of Feraras, &c. They are proclaimed Traitors.

(67) These things divulged, and their rebellions still going on, Proclamations came forth denouncing them Traitors to their Queene, and Countrey; and the Lord Scroope Warden of the West-Marches, with the assistance of the Earle of Cumberland, and other Gentlemen of the Countrey, kept the Castle of Carlile, while Sir Iohn Foster Warden of the Middle-Marches, accompanyed with Sir Henry Piercy, exercised their manly resistance against these proud Rebels.

The Earle of Sussex leades against the Rebels.

(68) To withstand their still-growing outrage, Thomas Earle of Sussex (her Majesties Lieutenant Generall of the North) gathered some forces; whose Lieutenant for the footmen was Edward Earle of Rutland: and for the Horsemen, was Henry Lord Hunsdon, Lord Warden of the East-Marches William Lord Eure leading the rereward. These followed the enemy to North-Allerton, Croftbridge, Alke, Durham, Newcastle and Hexam, even close at their heeles; whose power was so weake, and purse so empty, (being defrauded of an hundred thousand Crownes, promised them by the Pope to maintaine the Rebellion) as that those Rebellious heads entred conference with Edward Dacres at Naworth, of their desperate estate, being both monielesse and powerlesse to withstand the puissance of the Lord Generall, now on their backes, as also the Earles of Warwicke, and Lincolne, the Lords Ferrers, Willowby, and Howard, approaching very neere them, even at Borow-brigges. No other succour their consultations could pitch on, then by flight into Scotland, unto those Lords that there stood out for the Romish.

His Holinesse promiseth treasure to advance the Rebellion.

The chiefe Rebell flie into Scotland.

(69) So the night following they put it in practise, not bidding their intrapped traine once farewell, which as sheepe without a Shepheard, stood gazing at their owne destructions, whilest Sussex surprized them without any resistance. Vpon whose ringleaders, Iustice so seized, that at Durham dyed, by Marshall Law, an Alderman, a Priest, and sixty sixe Constables, and in the Country for a great Circuit, a great number of such as were forwardest in the Action.

The remaining ringleaders executed.

(70) Not warned by these successes (which usually prove unhappy, in such disloyall attempts) Leonard Dacres of Harlesey began to gather head against; whose ayders were the more resolute, in revenge of their friends executed; and women also became stout Souldiers in quarrell of their husbands, all forward enough, and too forward to mischiefe. These upon a More neere unto Naworth, to impeach the Lord Hunsdon that made thitherward; had set downe their battell in a triangle forme, where they continued a long and most desperate conflict, but in the end were forced to give backe, and Dacres to flye from his slaine, wounded, and scattered people, towards Scotland, the then-Refuge of Traiterous transfugers.

Leonard Dacres renaueth the Rebellion.

An. Dom. 1570. Febr. 22. The Rebels enterbite themselves.

(71) Scotland thus harbouring those disloyall English, and their owne Lords divided into severall factions, some of them sought to conceale, and some to apprehend these guilty Earles; so that Westmorland, was shifted away into Flanders, but Northumberland, taken by the Regent, and committed to Custody, was afterwards sent into England, where having beene attainted by Parliament, upon the twenty two of August was beheaded at Yorke: using liberty of speeches, in avowing the Popes Supremacy, denying subjection unto his Soveraigne Queene, affirming the Realme to bee in a Schisme, and other obedient Subjects, no better then Hereticks. Charles Westmorland his consort, a person utterly wasted by looseneese of life, even by Gods just judgement, in the time of his rebellion, was bereaved of children, and afterwards wandring in forraigne parts, had his body eaten with ulcers of lewd causes, as is most constantly reported. But from these temporall proceedings (being the Domestick effects of a forraigne cause) let us a while behold the spirituall flourish of the Popes leaden sword, unsheathed at Rome, to enspirit and enflame such traiterous dispositions against Englands Queene.

(72) Nicholas Morton an Englishman, made Bishop by Pius Quintus, that Pontificall and surly Pope of Rome, who now having turned the Key of his Consistory, and set wide open the dores unto the complaints of his Clergy, against those Christian Princes that urged subjection to their positive Lawes (a Note indeed ill founding in the eares of his sons) amongst others, this puppet Bishop, commenced a feined suite and plea against Queene Elizabeth, whom thereupon Pius (like a transcendent Iudge) deprived from all Princely authority, as one uncapable either of Crowne, or Government, and with the curse of his impious mouth, sent forth his Bull to goare her Majesty, like to those of Bashan, that encompassed David, the tenour whereof (if the words corrupt not the ayre, and the inke the eyes of the beholders) shall stand for ever as a Pillar of Salt, and Monument of shame to that man of sinne; the transcript whereof, taken from the originall it selfe, is as followeth.

The declaratory sentence of the Vniversall Bishop, Pope Pius the fift, against Elizabeth the pretended Queene of England, and against the Hereticks that take her part.

Wherein also all her subjects are declared to be absolved from the Oath of Allegiance, and any other duty whatsoever, and besides, they that doe obey her, are pronounced accursed.

Pius the servant of the servants of God, for remembrance hereof in time to come.

(74) He that raigneth above; to whom is given all power in Heaven and Earth, hath committed in fulneſſe of power to be governed, one holy Catholike and Apoſtolike Church (where-our is no salvation) to one onely in Earth, namely, Peter the Prince of the Apoſtles, and to the Romane Bishop the Succeſſor of Peter. And him alone hath he made Chiefe over all Nations and Kingdomes, who may roote out, destroy, scatter, waſte, plant, and build: that the faithfull people knit together with the band of mutuall Charity, might be kept in the vnity of the Spirit, and presented in health and safety unto their Saviour. For the undergoing of which office, we being called by the goodneſſe of God to the government of the ſaid Church, doe refuſe and omit no paines, labouring by all meanes that this unity and Catholike Religion (which the Author thereof for the triall of the faith of thoſe that be his, and for our correction and amendment, hath ſuffered to be toſſed with ſo great afflictions) might be preserved whole and entire. But the number of the wicked hath ſo much encreaſed in power, that now there is no place in the World left, which they have not attempted to corrupt by moſt wicked Doctrine; among the reſt, Elizabeth the ſervant of ſinfulneſſe, the pretenſed and unlawfull Queene of England; with whom, as in a Sanctuary the moſt wicked Perſons of all doe finde a refuge. This Queene, ruling the Kingdome, and monſtrouſly uſurping to her ſelfe the place of the ſupreme Head of the Church throughout all England, and the chiefe authority and juriſdiction of the ſame, hath revoked againe to miſerable ruine this very Kingdome, which was in a manner recovered againe to the Catholike faith, and good devotion. For the uſe of the true Religion (which the moſt lawfull Queene Mary of famous memory, by the helpe of this Seate had repayred, being before by the Apoſtata Henry the eight, overthrowne) now by ſtrong hand reſtrained, and the errours of Heretikes imbraced and followed; ſhee hath removed the Councell of State that conſiſted of the Engliſh Nobility, and filld the ſame with obſcure hereticall fellowes; ſhee hath oppreſſed the Profeſſors of the Catholike faith, and hath ſet up wicked Preachers and Miniſters of impieties. Shee hath aboliſhed the Sacrifice of the Maſſe, Prayers, Almes, difference of meate, ſingle life, and Catholike rites. Shee hath commanded Bookes to bee ſet forth containing manifeſt Hereſie, and her ſelfe uſing and obſerving wicked Rites, and Inſtitutions, according to Calvins preſcription; hath alſo commanded them to be obſerved by her Subjects. Shee hath preſumed to caſt out Biſhops of Churches, Rectors, and other Catholike Prieſts, from their Churches and Beneficeſ, and to diſpoſe of them and other Eccleſiaſticall livings among Hereticall men; preſuming alſo to judge of Church matters, ſhee hath forbidden the Prelates, the Church and people, that they ſhould not acknowledge the Romane Church, nor that they obey his Precepts and Canonicall Injunctions; she hath compelled many to yeeld to her wicked lawes, and to forsweare and abjure the authority and obedience of the Roman Bishop, and to acknowledge her by their Oath, the onely Governour in temporall and spirituall matters; shee hath imposed penalties and punishments upon those which were not obedient to her command, and hath exacted the like upon them which perfevered in the unity of the Faith, and in the aforesaid obedience; shee hath cast into prison the Catholike Governours and Rectors of Churches, where many, laden with daily languishings and sorrow, have wofully ended their lives. All which things, for as much as they are notorious and manifest to all Nations, and so approved by the most grave testimony of very many, that no way is left them for excuse, defence, or evasion: Wee moved by the impieties and mischiefes that more and more multiply, besides the grievances of the faithfull, the affliction of Religion which groweth daily more intollerable by the meanes and working of the said Elizabeth, whose minde is so hardned and indurate, that shee hath not onely contemned the godly prayers and admonitions of Catholike Princes for her health and conversion, but also hath not suffered the messengers of this See to come into England to her about this businesse, We, I say, moved by these causes, have of necessity betaken our selves to the weapons of Iustice against her, not being able to refraine from griefe and sorrow, that we must needs punish such a one, whose Ancestors have so well deserved of the Common-weale, and of all Christendome. Being therefore strengthened with his authority, who hath pleased so fet us in this supreame Throne of Iustice, though unfit for so great a burthen, wee by the fulnesse of our Apostolike power, doe declare the foresaid Elizabeth an Hereticke, and a maintainer of Heretickes, and those that take her part in the things aforesaid, to have incurred the sentence of Anathema, and to be cut off from the unity of Christs body. And moreover that shee is deprived of the pretenced right of her said Kingdome, and also from all Rule, dignity, and prehemminence whatsoever, and also her Nobility, Subjects, and people of the said Realme, and all other which have sworne unto her, by any manner of meanes, are absolved for ever from such Oath, and from all duty of Empire, fidelity, and obedience, in such sort as we doe absolve them by the authority of these presents, and deprive the said Elizabeth of the pretended right of the Kingdome, and of all other things aforesaid. And wee doe command and forbid all and singular of the Nobility, Subjects, People, and other aforesaid, that they presume not to obey her admonitions, commands, nor lawes. Whosoever shall doe otherwise, we doe enwrap them in the like curse. And because it were too difficult a matter to beare these presents to every place where there is need, we will that the Copies of them being signed with the hand of the publike Notary, and Ecclesiasticall Prelate, or with the Seale of his Court, have the same credit and authority in Court, and without it with all Nations every where, that the presents themselves should have if they were exhibited. Ifai.59.5. The fruits and effects of the Popes Bull.

(75) The webbe thus woven by these Spiders of Rome, and the Cockatrices Egge hatched into a Serpent, many were imployed to patch up this garment of iniquity, and Spirits sent abroad to corrupt Englands sweet ayre; the one sort, plotters of invasions to lay the Land waste, and the other, conspirators against her annointed person. The chiefe of either in this place, (omitting the order of Annals) that they may ranke together without interruption of berter narrations, and not infect the Paper in more places then one, I will here lay downe; assuring my selfe, that many more attempts were plotted, then ever were displayed. For the thunderbolt of curses throwne frow that Iupiter of Rome, denounced her Majestie uncapable either of Crowne or Kingdome, tooke such rootes in the hearts of these Locusts, that they both armed themselves openly to battell, and secretly sought to imbrue their barbarous hands in their Princes bloud.

Apoc.

(76) For this brutish Bull, calved in the Popes Consistory (or rather Cow-house) and now able to travell from Rome; in London, and at the West end of Pauls, first put forth his hornes, being there hung upon the Bishops Palace Gate, by a lewd person imployed as an Herauld from the Pope. Moreton an old English fugitive, (as hath beene said) had procured it: brazen-faced Sanders in his writings maintained it, Bristow in his Motives approved it, Northumberland and Nevil had put it in practise, Iohn Felton had divulged it, the two Nortons supported it, and many after-followers assaied to execute it; all which like Serpents bitte the bosomes wherein themselves lay, but never could hurt her, the Lords beloved and holy Annointed, who in peace and glory came to her grave, in a full age, as a Ricke of Corne into the Barne in due season.

The Popes Bull hanged up at the Bishop of Londons gate.

Iob 5. 26.

(77) The Marshalls, besides them in the North, were Iohn Throckmorton, Thomas Brooke, and George Redman, with others, who intended with sound of Trumpet and Drum, to proclaime their divellish designe at Harleston Faire, in the County of Norfolke; their shew being for the suppression of Strangers, but their maineend, to make a strange alteration in the State; whereby they hastened their owne ends, suffering a death due to Traitors.

(78) But more dangerous were those Conspiratours, which secretly plotted to bring in forraigne powers, or publikely by their writings animated men thereunto, defaming the faire face of Englands Religion, and deforming the body of Elizabeths Government; in which kinde Sanders and Bristow, two English fugitives, were the Iannes and Iambres that withstood Moses; men of corrupt mindes, and enemies to the Faith; Traitors, headly, and high minded, having a shew of godlinesse, but denying the power thereof, as the Apostle prophesied, that in the last dayes such should arise: both of them approving Pius Quintus his proceeding about her Majesties deprivation, and justifying the wicked in their Rebellions, contrary to the Doctrine of that Apostle, whose Chayre they pretend to uphold. From which sinke of iniquity, issued those corrupt streames, that became bitter as wormwood, the taste whereof brought many to their untimely, but well-deserved deaths: among whom, first was Felton, the two Nortons, Kenelme Barne, and Edmund Mather; not long after whom, followed Doctor Story, who may not bee forgotten in our Story.

Apoc 8.11.

(79) This man by birth was English, though an Alien in heart, by profession a Civilian, and Doctor of the Canon Law, a persecutor of Gods Saints in the dayes of the last Queene, and in this Queenes raigne, a turbulent inveigher against the Religion established in the English Church. For which being apprehended and committed to prison, hee found meanes of escape, and in Antwerpe received Commission under Duke D'Alva, to search all Ships comming thither for English Bookes; not forgetting his tyranny wherein he had beene trained, nor to further trayterous policy and great attempts to bring in forraine powers for Englands overthrow. But the pit that he digged, he fell into himselfe, and the destruction prepared for others, light on his owne pate; for one Parker an English Merchant, loyally affected to his Prince trading to Antwerpe, laid his faire faire to catch this foule Bird; causing secret notice to be given unto Story, that in his Ship were store of Heretical Bookes, with other intelligences, which might stand him in steed.

His imprisonment and flight.

(80) The Canonist conceiving that all was Cock-sure,

Cock-sure, hasted to execute his Commission himselfe, where with lookes very bigge upon the poore Mariners, each Cabbin, Chest, and Corner, above board were searched, and some things found to draw him further on; so that the Hatches must be opened, which seemed to bee unwillingly done, and great signes of feare was shewed by their faces. This drew on the Doctor to descend into the hould; where now in the Trap, the Mouse might well gnaw, but could not get out: for the Hatches went downe, and the Sayles hoysed up, which with a merry gale were blowne into England, where ere long hee was arraigned, and condemned of high Treason, and accordingly was executed at Tyburne, as hee had well deserved.

(81) To the like end came Sherwin, Campion, Kirby, with others seditious Trumpetters of this infamous Bull, and Sanders the Irish Legate, the greatest maintainer of his goaring authority, though he escaped the Barre of Iustice, yet was found out by a raving Phrensie, as he wandred succourlesse in the waste Mountaines of Ireland, wherein lastly he miserably dyed. But to leave these poysonous tongue-men and libellous Pen-men to register their owne shame, and feare their consciences with the brand of sinne; let us discover those other daring and swording Monsters, who actually imployed themselves to lay either violent hands vpon her Majesties person, or the Land open to forraigne Invasions.

(82) The first of them (or first manifested) was Iohn Sommervile of Elsowe in Warwickeshire, a furious young man, who like a tempest that threatned destruction, came ragingly forward towards the Court, with intent to murther the Queene; the progresse of which attempt summarily was thus. Keeping his Whitsontide with Arden, (his Wives Father) he was there so wrought by Hall a Seminary Priest, as hee conceived a desperate rage against her Majesty, holding it a matter (seeing there was no hope of alteration during the life of the Queene) meritorious to make her away; to which bloudy resolution, he was further instigated by his wicked wife. Whereupon returning home, he grew much perplexed, having many feares and conflicts in himselfe, which caused his Wife to write unto Hall, to come and strengthen the man with firmer resolutions. But he, busied elsewhere with the like purposes, by Letter excused his not comming, yet therein advised him to goe forward, promising he would assist him with his prayers to God for his good successe.

(83) This Letter received, he grew fully resolved to actuate the designe, and hasted his journey amaine towards London, who no sooner departed, but that his wife sent Halles Letter unto her Mother, and shee presently made it knowne to Arden her Husband, which Letter he caused to be burnt, as soone as himselfe was called in question. But Sommervile discovered by the way, was indited in Warwicke, and those his Associates condemned of high Treason in London; Sommervile confessing his intent, said, that he had been moved thereunto by his wicked spirit, and by the inticements of certaine seditious persons, his Kinsmen and Allies, together with the often reading of pernicious Bookes, published against her Majesty. This desperate Ruffian committed to Newgate after his condemnation, most desperatly strangled himselfe to death; an example of Gods severity against such sonnes of disobedience.

To shrowd themselves and their Disciples from that danger of Law, at the suite of Campion, Persons, Haywood, and Hart, a dispensation was given to the Camelion Catholikes, from the rigorous extent of the foresaid Bull: so that most of these Seminaries imploied for England, cast off their Serpentine Skinnes, and shewed themselves abroad in the attire of Gallants, the more safely to vent their envenomed drugs; and to keepe their Coules from preaching at the Gallowes.

Let there be desired of our most high Lord an explication or meaning of the Bull declaratory, made by Pius the fifth against Elizabeth, and such as doe adhere, or obey her: Which Bull the Catholikes desire to be understood in this manner, that the same Bull shall always bind her and the Heretikes, but the Catholikes it shall by no meanes bind, as matters doe now stand or be, till hereafter, when the publike execution of that Bull may be had, or made. And in the Conclusion thus, The highest Pontiffe granted these fore-said Graces to Father Robert Parsons, and Edmund Campion, who are now to take their way into England the fourteenth day of April, in the yeare of our Lord, 1580. being present, the Father Oliverius, Manarke assistant. And though the one of these Spyders spunne his Webbe so in corners, as he could not be found, yet was the other swept downe by the hand of Iustice, and drew his last threed in the Triangle of Tyburne. After whom others, as some likewise before them, ploughing with the same Heyfer, and sowing the furrowes with the same feed, reaped their harvest with no better increase, then tares or darnell could yeeld, as was seene by their successes.

GOD grant you all there to know your owne bleſſing, and to thanke God of it. His imployment was to ſound the Havens for entrance, and to collect a Catalogue of the names of ſuch great men in every County of England, as ſtood for the Papall cauſe, unto who Charles Paget (masked under the names of Nope and Spring) was joyned for an aſſiſtant. Sir Francis Englefield in the Low-Countries, and others elſewhere had vehemently ſollicited the King of Spaine to attempt Englands Invaſion, and the Duke of Guize, undertooke to be the principall leader, conditionally that Rome and Spaine would beare the charge of the warre.

But a certaine Casket covered with greene velvet, was cunningly conveyed from under a bed, and carried to the Spaniſh Ambaſſador, wherein many things lay hid, that never after came to light; as alſo a letter which himſelfe was then writing in Ciphers, hee conveyed from the ſight of the ſearchers: all which himſelfe confeſſed, and with his owne Pen wrote the whole Conſpiracy, for which, after judgement he moſt worthily dyed.

(94) Not warned by theſe, William Parry (as hee named himſelfe) a man of a profuſe waſtfulneſſe, riot, and prodigality, having conſumed two Widdowes wealths, and wounded his Creditor, by committing Burglary, was for the fact condemned to die, but fued and obtained his pardon of life by the compaſſioned mercy of Queene Elizabeth, which he, ungratefull man, fought to requite, by vowing her death, that ſaved him from his. For travelling into foraigne parts, and there obtaining the title of a Civillian Doctor, he fell from his naturall alleagiance (as riotous Malecontents uſually doe) and reconciled himſelfe unto the See of Rome, then having frequent acquaintance and conference with certaine Ieſuiticall Prieſts, was finally inſpired with a helliſh reſolution to kill her, who had given him life.

For having private acceſſe to her preſence, was heard at large, that hee was the man who had undertaken her death, which to found the deepe waters, and to beare fayle with the faireſt, he promiſed to doe, with no intent, as he conſtantly affirmed, to act that impoſed charge, but onely to diſcover thoſe who laid for her life. Her Highneſſe (whoſe piercing underſtanding was not eaſily blinded, or beguiled with words) ſeemed ſo doubtfully to interpret his confeſſed fact (which yet ſhee kept ſecret from her peereſt Counſellors) that he in great feare departed; as how can a conſcience ſo clogged, but feare? Whereupon his late letter from Como he ſhewed; which ſeeming alſo to be little eſteemed, and his ſuit to be Mr. of S^t. Katherines, utterly rejected, confirmed more deſperatly his reſolution to kill her: and often having weapon, preſence, place, & opportunity, purpoſely thought to performe it, but ever was daunted when he beheld the glory of her preſence, and Majeſty in her face, wherein to his ſeeming, the Image of God, in her his Vicegerent, was portrayed, commanding him obedience, and threaning deſtruction to thoſe who intend violence againſt his holy Annointed.

Violently depoſed, in caſe of the religion of Rome) upon theſe ſpurres hee poſted to a worthy Gentleman, whom he ſuppoſed as diſcontented as himſelfe, opening his Treaſons for the bringing in of forraigne invaders, ſolliciting his aſſiſtance, and threatning with dagge, or dagger to kill the Queene.

(98) The Gentlemen, loathing this horrible intent, revealed the Treaſon unto two principall Privie Counſellers, and they unto her Majeſty, who committed his examination unto Sir Francis Walſingham her principall Secretarie, a man of exquiſite judgement, integrity and induſtry in all ſtate affaires and intelligences; the Treaſons then found out, and confeſſed by himſelf, were divulged by his voluntarie pen, and ſubſcribed unto with his own hand, with many other circumſtances unknowne before and againe were ſeconded by another letter, written to the Lords of the Counſell, which heere out of the Originall, I have inſerted.

(99) My Lords now that the conſpiracy is diſcovered, the faults confeſſed, my conſcience cleared, and minde prepared patiently to ſuffer paines due for ſo hainous a crime: I hope it ſhall not offend you, if crying, Miſerere, with the poore Publican, I leave to deſpaire with curſed Caine. My caſe is rare, and ſtrange, and for any thing I can remember ſingular: a naturall Subject ſolemnely to vow the death of his naturall Queene, (ſo borne, ſo knowne, and ſo taken by all men) for the reliefe of the afflicted Catholike, and reſtitution of Religion. The matter firſt conceived in Venice, the ſervice (in generall words) preſented to the Pope, continued and undertaken in Paris and laſtly, commended and warranted by his Holineſſe; digeſted and reſolved in England, if it had not been prevented by accuſation, or by her Majeſties greater lenity and more gratious uſage of her Catholike Subjects. This is my firſt and laſt offence conceived againſt my Prince, or Country, and doth (I cannot deny) containe all other faults whatſoever. It is now to bee puniſhed by death, or moſt graciouſly (beyond all common expectation) to bee pardoned. Death I doe confeſſe to have deſerved: life I doe (with all humilitie) crave, if it may ſtand with the Queens Honour, and policie of the time To leave ſo great a Treaſon unpuniſhed, were ſtrange; to draw it by my death, in example, were dangerous. A ſworne ſervant to take upon him ſuch an enterprize, upon ſuch a ground, and by ſuch a warrant, hath beene ſeene in England. To indite him, arraigne him, bring him to the Staffold, and to puniſh his offence, can doe no good. To hope that hee hath more to diſcover then is confeſſed, or that at his execution he will unſay any thing he hath written, is in vaine. To conclude, that it is impoſſible for him in time to make ſome part of amends, were very hard and againſt former experiences. The queſtion then is, whether it be better to kill him, or (leſt the matter bee miſtaken) upon hope of his amendment to pardon him. For mine owne opinion (though partiall) I will deliver you my conſcience. The caſe is good Queene Elizabeths; the offence is committed againſt her ſacred perſon; and ſhee may (of her mercy) pardon it without prejudice to any. Then this I ſay in few words, as a man more deſirous to diſcharge his troubled conſcience, then to live. Pardon poore Parrie, *and releeve him: for life without living is not fit for him. If this may not bee, or be thought dangerous or diſhonourable to the Queenes Majeſty (as by your favours I thinke is full of honour and mercy) then I beſeech your Lordſhips (and no other) once to heare mee before I be indicted, and afterwards, if I muſt die, humbly to entreat the Queenes Majeſty to haſten my triall and execution: which I pray God with all my heart, may proove as honourable to her; as I hope, it ſhall bee happy to me. (101) *Sir, his Holineſſe hath ſeene your letter of the firſt, with the aſſurance included, and cannot but commend the good diſpoſition, and reſolution, which you write to hold towards the ſervice and benefit publike: wherein his Holineſſe doth exhort you to perſevere, with cauſing to bee brought to effect that which you promiſe. And to the end you may be ſo much the more holpen by that good ſpirit which hath moved you thereunto, his holineſſe doth grant you plenary indulgence, and remiſſion of all your ſinnes, according to your requeſt. Aſſuring you that beſides the merit that you ſhal receive therefore in heaven, his Holineſſe will further make himſelfe debtor to acknowledge and requite your deſervings, by all the beſt meanes he may. And that ſo much the more in that you uſe the more modeſty, in not pretending any thing. Put therefore to effect your holy and honorable determinations, and attend your health. (102) Had not then her Majeſty juſt cauſe to complaine, as ſhee did? when in the honourable aſſembly of Parliament, ſhee openly profeſſed, that ſhee knew no creature breathing, whoſe life ſtood hourely in more perill then her owne; and that even at the firſt entrance into her eſtate, ſhe entred into infinite dangers of life, as one that had to wreſtle with many, and mighty enemies. And yet, in confidence of her celeſtiall Protector, and of her owne innocency, ſhee often ſeemed ſomewhat too remiſſe and neglective in the care of her ſelfe, and life, as appeared manifeſtly by her proceedings with this laſt Traitor, in keeping his conference of that importance, from the knowledge of her Counſellers, and often admitting privately his acceſſe, though he had told her, he was the man appointed to worke her death. And indeed ſuch was this Princeſſe Magnanimity, that in an apparant danger, as great, though not ſo traiterous as this, ſhee ſhewed a reſolution of courage farre above her ſex, when being in her Barge upon Thames to take the aire, accompanied with the French Ambaſſador, the Earle of Lincolne, and others, a Servitgman in the Court from his Caliver diſcharged a Bullet, and ſhot the waterman, within ſixe foote of her ſeat, (the ſecond to her Bale) through both the armes; whereat all other being amazed, and the man abundantly bleeding, ſhe threw him her ſcarfe, and with words of comfort bad him be of good cheere, he ſhould not want, for the bullet was aimed at her, though it hit him; and with ſuch reſolute courage bare it out, as all preſent, admired. Neither ſo onely, but knowing afterwards that it was done caſually at randome, ſhee both pardoned the party of his life, when hee was to die, and commanded his Maſter to retaine him againe into his ſervice.

(103) And indeed, of ſingular clemency, and in-bred lenity was this Lady, that ſhee never heard mention of the capitall (though never ſo deſerved) puniſhment of offenders, even of ſuch as had ſought her owne death, but it bred a kind of horrour and ſorrow in her; whereby, had not her Counſels ernеſtly iuculcated the neceſſity of ſuch exemplary Juſtice, many dangerous attempters had eſcaped their due due punishment. Which moved her to say, being once questioning with a * great Divine of Oxford, about bookes meeteſt for Princes to ſtudy on, that her Reading of Seneca de Clementia, had done her much good, but ſome would perſwade her, it had done her State as much harme. But for her love to her people in generall, and tender care over the poorer ſort, or any waies oppreſſed, it was incomparable; whoſe eares were not onely open at all times to their complaints, and her hands ready to receive their petitions; but her manner was alſo to commend their cauſe unto her counſell and Iudges, giving theſe and the like earneſt charges; Have care of my people, you have my place: doe you to them that which I ought to do, they are my people, yet every man oppreſſeth and ſpoileth them without mercy. Themſelves can neither helpe themſelves, nor revenge their quarrell: See unto them, I pray you, ſee unto them, for they are my charge, them therefore I charge you with, even as God hath committed them unto me. I care not for my ſelfe, my life is not deare unto mee, my care is for my people; I pray God my Succeſſor bee as carefull for them; and ſurely they which might know my cares for my people, may likewiſe conceive, that I take no great joy in wearing the Crowne.

An. Dom. 1585. Henry Piercy E. of Northumberland.

(105) Thoſe Proſelites ſo unceſſantly, yeere by yeere, proſecuted the Romane cauſe, that many of them thereby deſervedly came to their deaths: amongſt whom was Henry Piercy Earle of Northumberland, gone ſo farre in ſuch diſloall enterprizes, as being upon ſuſpition of Treaſon committed to the Tower of London, the laid violent hands upō his owne life, by diſcharging a Dagg, charged with three bullets, under his left pappe, wherewith hee pierced his heart, and preſently dying, was by a Iury found guilty of his owne death. The Treaſon laid againſt him (beſides the former of the inſurrection in the North, by himſelfe confeſſed, and by the Court fined at five thouſand Markes) was, that he had beene privy to the Plots of Throgmorton, for the bringing in of Forraigne powers, to the deſtruction of the Queene and Realme; which truth being revealed by other conſpirators, hee ſo deepely apprehended, as in that deſperate manner hee prevented his further iudgement.

That Lord Pierey could doe much in the North, Arundel in the South, and the Lord Paget in the heart of the Land, though two of them were then in Priſon, and Paget in Spaine; their onely want was of a Nobleman to leade them, whereof they were deſtitute, as Babington complained, unleſſe it were Weſtmorland, and he out of the Realme.

But being intercepted before he well wiſt, hee was committed to Cuſtody, yet ſo as he went abroad with his Keeper, from whom he ſhortly made his eſcape, and thinking to recover the Seas, diſguiſed himſelfe like a Labouring man, ſtaining with wall-nut-tree leaves his hands and face, which ſhadowed neither his ſhame nor ſinne, neither yet could hide him from the eye that called him to account; for being deſcryed and brought backe to London, hee was with curſes of the people committed to the Tower, whence he could not ſo eaſily ſtart.

(111) The other conſpirators, hearing of theſe their confederates ſucceſſe, diſperſed themſelves and plaied leaſt in ſight, yet were they found out, indited and brought to their trials, all of them confeſſing their Treaſons without any torture. Yet at their arraigenment (perſwading themſelves belike, that what they did by papall warrant, could not be called Treaſon,) they pleaded not guilty, which the Iury upon manifeſt proofes finding otherwiſe, they worthily received iudgement of death, and died accordingly in Lincolnes Inne fields, even in the place where they had often conferred for the execution of their Treaſons.

Then other Doctors of Phyſicke were called, for to examine the ingredients, who eaſily found that the potion was poiſon, for which hee was indicted and arraigned at Barre, where hee pleaded not guilty, and his two Conſorts by long circumſtances ſought to ſave their lives, yet their former confeſſions ſubſcribed with their own hands, gave ſufficient teſtimony of their guilts; for which at Tyburne upon the ſeventh of June they ſuffered death.

(119) To forward this enterprize, three ſeverall conſultations were held at Bruxels, wherein Holt late as Preſident, and William Stanley Proteſtor for this divelliſh deſigne, animating Yorke by his uncles example, to be conſtantly reſolved as a man ordained for his Countries good, and though many had miſcarried in attempting the Act, yet that it was meritorious and eaſie to be done. Thomas Throgmorton, Michaell Moody, Charles Paget, Henry Owen, Edmund Garret, and the two divine Doctors, Gifford and Worthington were principall ſpeakers in this impious Parliament, all of them eager to egge on the two undertakers, & to joyne to them a third man, named Young, whoſe taske ſhould be to kill the greateſt Counſellors, as ſoone as the Queene ſhould be dead. The laſt that ſpake was Holt the Preſident, who after he had miniſtred theſe Traitors their oathes, in threatning wiſe, menaced to take from the Engliſh this high and acceptable ſervice, and to employ therein Strangers, who were farre more worthy: and ſo ſent the two former into England with his bleſſing, which nevertheleſſe could not ſave them from the Gallowes: their purpoſes were to get entertainement of ſome great Courtier, the better to effect what they intended, and to ſeeme men of ſome note for intelligence, ſent from Callis to procure their paſport, but the vigilant eye of the Engliſh State had found out their treaſons before (and bringing them afterwards to their trials, they were found guilty, judged, and died like traitors.

(120) The laſt publike attempter, that aſſaied the Queenes death, was Edward Squire, a Scriviener of Greenewich, who by deputation had emploiment of a purveyor in the Stable, but being in wite above his vocation, and carrying his ſailes above his fortunes; put himſelfe in action for Sea in the laſt voyage that Sir Francis Drake made into the Indies. in his absence, was by him observed to bee of more capacity then commonly was found in a man of his quality, or education; for yeeres, mature, and passed his middle age; for carriage well advised, and resolute enough, if not too much, in not apprehending his eminent danger.

Squire a fit subject to worke upon.

(121) Vpon him Walpoole therefore meant to worke, conceiving for his purpose two speciall advantages: the one, that comming into Spaine a Prisoner, and not a fugitive, his returne into England would be without suspect; the other, that Squire had beene employed in the Queenes stable, and therefore had liberty of free accesse: But the more to involue what hee intended, hee subtilly caused Squier to be apprehended by the Inquisition, and put prisoner into the holy House: where mollified by distresse, hee got his heart into his hands, so that of a Neuter he became a fixed Romanist.

(122) This first assay prooving effectuall, for an introduction to his further intendments, he fell into the old song; whose burden was the tyrannies vsed, and the persecutions exercised in England against the poore Catholikes; vpon how few persons the English State did stand, and how easily those props were to be removed, if any devoted would put to their hands. Squier who wanted no wit to perceive whereat he aymed; first, gaue some slight signification, and after a more serious protestation, that he was the man, that would sacrifice himselfe and his service in the cause.

Walpoole projects the killing of the Earle of Essex.

(123) The good Father having thus got him into the circle, began then the charme: It were (said he) no doubt a worke meritorious to kill the Earle of Essex; but vnum necessarium, one thing is necessary: And then told him plainely, that he meant to put a fervice vpon him of great worth, and reward; which he might accomplish without any evident perill of life, because it was to bee done not immediately vpon her person, nor in her presence, neither yet in doing it (though hee were seen) should bee endangered, being acted as hee would prescribe; and that was to impoyson the pommell of the Queenes saddle, at such time as thee should ride abrode, the pommell being the place, whereon thee would rest her hand, and her hand not unlikely to touch her mouth or nostrils, would give accesse to the forcible poison, This, said he, might easily be performed, he having familiar acquaintance in the Quirry, yea and that very safely; but if otherwise, and immediate death happened, he should be assured, that for the exchange of this present and transitory life, to enjoy the state of a glorious Saint in heaven.

He teacheth how to poyson the Queens Saddle.

Walpoole hellish consultations.

(124) Which Syrens song ended, and Squier invegled; confessions, vowes, promises, receit of the Sacrament, and all confirmed the resolution of the divellish attempt; and to prevent varying from this Center, Walpoole told him, that now hee stood in the state of damnation, if hee did not his uttermost endeavour to performe his vow, bidding him remember, how that the sinne of backslyding did seldome obtaine pardon; and if he did but once make doubt of the lawfulnesse or merit of the act, it was enough to cast him head-long downe into hell; and if he did conceive any difficulties, he wished him to consider what it availed a man, to win the whole world, and to loose his owne soule.

His ghostly Counsels.

His Fatherly benediction.

(125) Squier thus armed (though not with the complete Armour of the Apostle) fell downe in confession before this Iesuites feet; whom hee lifted vp, hugd him about the necke with his left arme (such were Squiers owne words) and crossing him with his other hand, mumbled a few words in Latine, and then distinctly in English spake thus; God blesse thee, and give thee strength my sonne; bee of good courage, I pawne my soule for thine, and thou shalt have my prayers dead, and alive. Thereupon delivering vnto him the poyson, directed how it should be vsed; and shewed him the nature of the confection; which was, to bee put into a double bladder, and when it was to bee employed, to bee pricked full of holes, and so pressed out vpon the pommell of the Queenes saddle; the operation whereof was such, that vpon his hand hee must have a thicke double glove, least the poyson thereof should infect himselfe; whose vigour also was such, as neither continuance of time; nor subtilty of ayre could checke or un-vertuate the strength: And that the matter might bee carried without all suspect, an exchange was accepted of two Spanish prisoners in England, for Rowles and Squier to be released from Spaine.

The use and force of the poyson.

(126) Thus himselfe poysened in heart; and minding to poyson others, being monied by the Iesuite, arrived in England, not long before the expedition for Cadiz; which action (as hee thought) fitted him well, and thereupon made suite and obtained it, to attend the Earle of Essex in his owne ship; as well to be absent when the poyson should worke on her Majesty (which he meant to bestow before his departure) as to have opportunity thereby, to poyson the Earle himselfe. Occasion being given by the Queenes riding abroad, and her Horse made ready, and attending in the Stable-yard, thither Squier repaired full of evill spirits; and laying his hand upon the pommell of her Saddle, bruised out the poyson in the bladder saying cheerfully, God save the Queene; with no better affection then Ioab bare to Amasa, when with his hand he tooke him to kisse him, but with his sword struck him to the heart. His part thus plaid, Gods wonted and wonderfull protection beganne, who vnder his Canopy or wings of mercy had ever shadowed her from the stroke of danger, for albeit the * season was hot, and the veines open to receive any maligne tainture, yet her body felt no distemperature, nor her hand felt no more hurt, then Pauls did, when hee shooke of the Viper into the fire.

So many and so continually were the conspiracies.

Act. 28. 5.

(127) The deed thus done, without all mistrust, Squier taking the remaine of the poyson, within sixe daies after departed to the Sea, and had his entertainment in the Earle of Essex his owne Ship, where seeking to finish his divellish desigme betwixt Faial and Saint Michaels, bestowed his confection vpon the pommels of a wodden chaire, wherein the Earle usually fate at meales: which in like manner (the Lord so working) tooke not effect, to the no little admiration of Squier, though very well satisfied, that the default was not his, but rather in the poyson it selfe; and his vow now discharged (as he thought) he slept the more quiet.

Many more conspiracies then ever came to light.

Squiers endeavour to poyson the Earle of Essex going to Cadiz.

(128) Walpoole the Iesuite over-tickled with ioye of his hoped successe, and not able longer to keepe secrecy, imparted his treasons to his companions in Spaine, who together with him daily expected the issue thereof, but all things silent, and no newes of the Catastrophe, they changed their opinions, and held Squier for a false brother, when as also their longing hearts beganne to feare, lest the maine cause would bee mard, being cast into so bad a mould. Whereupon a consultation was called, and the Sicophant condemned in the highest degree, whose end must be speedily wrought, or else those Catholike proceedings would surely come to wracke; for that he knowing much, would (as was feared) reveale much more; and therefore it was politikely concluded, that one should be let slip from them into England, to give information of Squiers treasons.

Squier misinformed to be false brother.

(129) This man to have the more credit, brought two letters in his budget, the one he affirmed, himself had stolne out of a Iesuite study, & the other brought from another person, both which indeed were found to bee counterfeit; and Squier for the present reputed an honest man. Yet because the matter was tender, and touched neer the quicke, Squier was sent for; and examined; at first hee denies all, but comming to circumstances; something was found, hold taken, and the Traitor committed to Prison; who left alone, beganne to bethinke him how farre his Confessors Confession might extend, and therefore by good Counsell (the truth withall working) he he disclosed the Treason, and how far he had therein gone, which indeed no man had knowledge of but himselfe, and this confessed at the Tower, without torture, and at the Barre with remorse of conscience, he had his sentence of death, which he accordingly suffered.

The first motive to the State to make sharpe lawes to prevent Treasons.

1 Sam. 20. 3.

(130) Had not then the wise Statists of the Land, cause to enact such Lawes as they did; to set the shaking Sword in the entrance of this faire Eden, and to stop out the wilde Boare that would lay the Vineyard waste? their Queene and lamp of Glory, having thus often and narrowly escaped extinguishing, by as many hands of murthering Priests and Iesuites, as Dauid had pursuers of his life, when to Ionathan he complained, that there was but a step betwixt him and death? So that iustly in a conference of Parliament, for meanes to be had against the many conspirators, daily levelling at her royall heart, one of good repute, having experience of their desperate designes, in the open Assembly, with a feeling affection, thus uttered his minde: that every night when hee awaked, he feared to heare some newes of desperate mischiefe, and protested before God, he never saw the light of the day, but that he feared before the Sun-set, to heare of some strange attempt.

(131) For as the Pope had denounced under his Buls, an absolution to him that would dethroane Elizabeth, Englands faire Queene: so were there many foule minded Proselites, that reputed her bloud as an acceptable sacrifice, which many times they sought to offer unto their God: but hers and our God, the Watchman of Israel, neither slumbred nor slept in protecting her Person, as the apple of his eye; whose just defence, her innocency, and their bloudy guilts, have often divulged to the whole world; never any Prince escaping so many dangers, as this most milde and maiden Queene in her daies had done, and many more no doubt were put in practice, which lay groveling in darkenesse, and never came to light, and as the workes of darkenesse, so let them lie, and let us hasten to our former, and farre more pleasing Subject. Having therefore from the yeare 1570. made our digression, for the closer relation of all those treacheries together; let us thence pursue the ensuing occurrents of her raigne and life.

Parl. in An. 13. Eliz. Reg. April. 2.

(132) In Anno 1571. and thirteenth of her most happy Raigne, that the State might be stayed upon an approved succession, a Parliament was called, and therein thus was enacted: For the avoiding of contentions, and seditions spreading abroad titles to the succession of the Crowne of this Realme, to the disturbing of the quiet of the Realme: Be it enacted by the authoritie aforesaid, that whosoever shall hereafter during the life of our said Soveraigne Lady, by any Booke, or worke printed or written, directly and expressly declare, and affirme at any time before the same bee by Act of Parliament of this Realme established and affirmed, that any one particular person, whosoever is he, is, or ought to be the right Heire and successor to the Queenes Majesty that now is, (whom God long preserve) except the same be the naturall issue of her body: or shall wilfully set up in open place, publish, or spread any Bookes or Scrowles to that effect; or shall print, binde, or put to sale, or vtter any such Booke, or writing wittingly: that he, or they, their Abettors and Counsellors, and every of them shall for the first offence suffer imprisonment of one whole yeare, and forfeit halfe his goods, whereof the one moity to the Queenes Majesty, the other moity to him or them that will sue for the same, by bill, action of debt, plaint, information, or otherwise, in any of the Queenes Majesties Courts, wherein no essoyne or protection shall be allowed: And if any shall essoomes off and therein, then they, and every of them, their Abettors, and Counsellors shall incurre the paines and forfeitures which in the Statutes of provision, or premunire are appointed and limitted.

(133) Notwithstanding, these sharpe threats, and seeming set edge against such offenders, and disturbers of State, yet was the prosecution thereof executed with a more soft temper: for not any one person (resting there onely without further attempts) felt the weight of that imposed fine: so milde was the disposition of this Maiden Queene, and so inclined to mercy, though necessitie required more strict Iustice in those rebellious, and Papall times.

(134) But that Pen of Sanders which enviously hath written, and those Romanists that suspiciously have glozed upon the words of that Parliament, the Naturall Issue of her Body, as intended for an unlawfull Bed, let be accursed, and them accounted for shameleese Recorders of State passages, who oprobriously seeke and search into the thoughts of farre better Subjects, and by their selfe-wicked imaginations, doe blot the faire proceedings of that Honourable Assembly, and as much as in them is, defame the vertues of that Virgin Queene: whose chaste remembrance among her many other Princely parts, is celebrated through the whole World, and ever shall be.

(135) But she being the Maule that beate downe ther Dagon, and the Lyon that met their crooked Serpent in his way, those Wizards teeth were set on edge with untruths, and their tongues as sharpe Razors whetted unto slander: for which let themselves expect, and we attend what reward shall be given unto such false tongues.

Pfalme 120.

(136) Nor was Scotland free from their treacherous attempts, when at the same time their Regent was slaine by the shot of an Harquebuse, as he rode through Lithquo, mistrusting no danger. And a roade made into England in time of peace, by some discontented Scotish, who carryed great booties with them into Scotland: to recover which, Sussex the Earle Generall, and Lord Hunsdon, Governour of Barwicke followed, and in Tividale did much hurt to the Inhabitants.

(137) New troubles thus arising, as well for the death of the Regent, as for the under propping of the then falling Pinacles of the Church of Rome, the Land full of factions, and all in civill broyles, the English Queenes aide was sent for, by some of the Lords, who with their helps, prevailed in winning and demolishing many strong and faire Castles. And the Earle of Lennox sent into Scotland by her Majesty, was first made Lord Gevernour, and after Lord Regent, by the election of their three Estate, who afterwards was as traytorously murthered, as the other before him had beene, which caused great troubles in Scotland; yea, and some Nobles of England were not exempted from the same.

(138) For Lord Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolke, intending some favours for the Scotish cause, proceeded so farre therein, as the letter of the Law tooke advantage of his life, to the great sorrow and laments of very many. For being a man filled with favour, both of his Prince, and of the People, Fortune at length made him a Ball for her banding; who first from Burnam besides Windsor was brought to Westminster, and thence by water was left Prisoner in the Tower, where hee remained from the eleventh of October, unto the fourth of August following, and then was removed to the Charter-House neere Smithfield, where he abode thirteene moneths space; till lastly he was sent backe againe into the Tower, where, upon the Hill, and ordinary Scaffold, he penitenly suffered death.

(139) In this yeare of Christs nativity, 1572. the eighteenth of November, appeared a strange Starre or Comet Northward, in the Constellation of Cassiopeia, even at the backe of her Chayre; which with three chiefe fixed Starres of the said Constellation, made a Geometricall figure losing-wise. This Starre in bigneese at the first appearing, seemed bigger then Iupiter, and not much lesse then Venus, when shee seemeth greateest. It never changed place, but was carried about with the daily motion of the Heavens, as all fixed Starres commonly are; and was observed by the greatest Mathematicians to have beene in place celestiall farre above the Moone, otherwise then ever any Comet hath beene seene, or naturally can appeare, nor the like from the beginning of the World did ever appeare, unlesse it were that which at Christs Nativitie was seene, unto which Starre indeed Philip of Mornay, Lord of Plessie, doth compare it. Tru. Christ. Relig. Chap. 34.

Duell or combat for title of Lands.

(140) About which time, a strange case (which we will insert, rather to shew the course of Iustice and mercy of the Queene, then for any other great use in Story) happened at the Common-Law Barre: where Simon Lowe, and John Kyme were Plaintifes, for a certaine Mannor and demaines in the Isle of Harty, adjoyning to that of Sheppey in Kent, wrongfully possest (as they alleaged) by Thomas Paramour, against whom they brought a Writ of right: the Defendant offered to maintaine his Title by Combate, which the Plaintifes accepted, and brought their Champions before the Iudges to the Barre. For Paramour was George Thorne, of a bigge and broad set, who cast downe his Gauntlet as Challenger, to iustifie Paramours right, which was taken up by Henry Naylor Master of Defence, a man proper and slender, and not very tall, who appeared for Lowe and Kyme, to make good their claime.

The two Champions.

The place of Combate.

(141) The place appointed for Combate, was in Tuttle-fields, where a Plot of ground of one and twenty yards square, was doubly rayled, and without the West-square a Stage for the Iudges, representing the Court of Common Pleas, behind the which two Tents were pitched, the one for Thorne, and the other for Naylor, the field with Scaffolds on every side for People to see: All things thus ready, and the day drawing on, her Majesty (who ever abhorred all bloud-shed) tooke the matter into her owne hands, and gave command, and directions for the Parties agreement, with a surcease from all further suite, which could not well be, unlesse the Champions appeared in field; who altogether ignorant of what was determined, upon the day affigned appeared in place, Thorne was there first, who was brought to his Tent by Sir Ierome Bowes; then came Naylor, having the Gauntlet borne before him upon a Swords point, a Truncheon (Taper-wise) typt with horne, about an elle long, and a shield of hard leather carryed after him; and so was conveyed to his Tent by Sir Henry Cheiney.

The manner of their entring lists.

(142) The Court set, and the Combatters called, Naylor entred the lysts, being led by the hand by Sir Ierome Bowes, where making his obeysance, he came to the Barre, and there held up his Shield. Then was Thorne brought into the lysts by Sir Henry Cheiney, and with like reverence hee held up his Shield. Whereupon an Oath was ministred to the approver, the Tenor whereof hee spake as followeth. Heare this, you Iudges, that I have this day neither eate, drunke, nor have upon me either bone, stone, ne grasse, or any enchantment, sorcery, or witch craft, where through the power of the Word of God might bee inleased or diminished, and the Divels power increased: and that my appeale is true, so helpe me God, and his Saints, nad by this Booke.

The oath ministred to the Challenger.

(143) Then was Proclamation made in her Majesties Name, that no Person of whatsoever estate, degree, or condition there present, be so hardy to give any token or signe, by countenance, speech, or language, either to the Prover, or to the Defender, whereby the one of them may take advantage of the other, and no person to remove, but keepe still his place: and every person to keepe their staves and their weapons to themselves; and suffer neither the said Prover, nor Defender to take any of of their weapons, or any other thing that may stand either to the said Prover or Defender any availe, upon paine of forfeiture of Lands, Tenements, Goods, Chattels, and imprisonment of their bodies, and making fine and ransome at the Queenes pleasure. But when all these Ceremonies were ended, the Lord Chiefe Iustice stood up, and forbade the proceedings, alotting Paramour the Lands, with the satisfying of the Plaintifes, and thereupon commanded Naylor to give Thorne againe his Gauntlet, which he unwillingly did; and so the Combate being ended, we may have leave to proceed.

The Combat ended before it begun.

(144) Peace flourishing in England, to the no great liking of the Seminaries that often sought to disturbe it: the Regent of Scotland craved aide of her Majestie, for the defence of the young King, and the Country, endangered at that time with civill broyles. Shee as tender in her affection, as hee dutifull in his alleageance, sent him fifteene hundred men, whereof Sir William Drury, Knight Marshall of Berwicke, was Generall. These comming to Edenborough, lay battery to the Castle, with no lesse then thirty Cannons, and were as valiantly resisted by the Scotish within, but for want of fresh water, and no aide to be expected, the Souldiers sicke, hurt, over-wearied, and divided in opinion, Lord Peterot being let downe from the wall, by compostition the Castle was surrendred, to the use of the young King, whereupon the English returned to Berwicke.

(145) This time of Elizabeths, like unto that of Augustus, when the Temple of Ianus stood (for the most part) continually shut, made London like Rome, to be most magnificently repaired, and with many stately edifices adorned, among which, for beautie and commodious use, none is more famous then the Royall Exchange, (so named by her Highnesse) whose Founder was Sir Thomas Gresham Knight, Agent to her Majestie, built for the confluence and commerce of Merchants, whose Trafficks were great, and in these times of peace, extended their Navigations into the farthest, (and till then, unsearched) parts of the World.

(147) The next yeare hee attempted thirtie leagues further, when finding Gold Ore (as was thought) and taking a man, woman, and child, of the Savage Contaynes, he returned into England; but as his gold proved drosse, so these lived not long, neither turned that discovery to any great profit, though it was againe the third time affaied by himselfe, and since by other most famous Navigators; the North-west by Englishmen being lately descried, to bee Seas more safe, and the passage of farre better hope.

(148) Among these Sea-Worthies our famous Vlisses, Sir Francis Drake is the first in the ranke, who the yeare of Christ Iesus 1577. and fifteenth of November, set saile from Plimmouth in a Fleet of five Ships, and one hundred, sixty foure men, who having put of Cap de Verd, in the beginning of February, hee saw no land, til the fifth of April following, being past the line, thirtie three degrees of latitude, and in the 36. degree entred the River Plate; whence hee fell with the straite of Magellan the one and twentie of August, which with three of his Ships he passed, having cast off the other two as impediments unto him, and the Mariegold tossed from her Generall after passage, was no more seene; but the other whereof Master Iohn Winter was Captaine, shaken also off by tempest, returned through the straits, and recovered England, only the Pellican whereof himselfe was Admirall, held on her course to Chily, Coquimbo, Cinnano, Palma, Lima, upon the West of America, where he passed the line the first day of March, and so forth till hee came to the Latitude 47. thinking by those North-Seas to have found passage to England. But fogs, frosts and cold winds forced him to turne his Course

This place for the glory of England, he named Nova Albion according to her ancient name; and at his departure reared a Monument to witnesse what there had beene done, which was a plate of brasse fixed in an eminent place, wherein was engraven her Majesties name, and her right to that province, as freely given unto her deputy both by King and people. Wherein also was written the yeare and day of their entrance, and of the lands deliverance; under which plate he put her Majesties picture and armes in a peece of Siver to retaine the memory of this service unto posteritie. From thence the fourteenth of November he fell with Ternate one of the Iles of Molucco, being courteously entertained of the King, and from thence he came unto the Iles of Celebees, to Iava Major, to the Cape Buona Speranze, and fell with the Coasts of Guinea, whence crossing againe the line, he came to the height of the Azores, and thence into England upon the third of November and yeare of Salvation 1580, after he had beene at Sea with such fortunate successe the space of three yeares lacking twelue daies. The small vessell wherein this admirable voyage was performed, was at her Majesties commandement, laid up in the docke besides Deepeford, where it remaineth as a monument of Englands great fame, unto this day; and the worthy Generall honoured with Knighthood, being the first that by travell encompassed the Earth, and saw the wonderous workes of God in those great deepes.

The Sultan Muraht his Letters to her Majestie.

(150) Most glorious, and in brightnesse most splendant woman, and of women the chiefest Prince of the mighsie followers of Iesus. Queene of the most famous Kingdome of England, most excellent Elizabeth, most sapient Governesse of all the affaires of the People, and Family of the Nazarites, the most pleasant Spring of brightnesse and glory, the most acceptable Cloud sweet showers, the heire and Lady of perpetuall happinesse, and blessednesse, of the most famous Kingdome of England, to whom all distressed suters doe flocke for reliefe. We wishing from GOD the mighty Creator, a most fortunate increase of all the affaires of your Excellency, and happy successe; and offering eternall vowes and praises worthy of our mutuall and perpetuall familiarity and league, and declaring the premisses, and that which followeth with singular decentnesse: Wee give you to understand most friendly, that certaine yeares passed, we had continuall warres with Casulbas, Prince of Persia, in right of our People, by reason whereof wee would not make warre upon other parts, whereby certaine thieves in the parts of Polonia, called Cosackes, and other wicked persons lurking in those confines, daily troubled and grieved our Subiects: now the Persian being vanquished, and by the power of the Almightie Creator, matters in those parts being compounded, wee determined to punish the said persons lurking in Poland, and other parts; and by the Beglerby of Greece our Army being ioyned, and sent with our charge by a Prince of Tartaria, in the yeare last passed, a part of the Kingdome of Polonia, was on our behalfe troubled, and wasted, and the said Cosackes, and other wicked persons were punished accordingly to their deserts, which the King of Poland seeing, and sending two messengers to our blessed Port, to inquire, finde out, and punish in full punishment, signified so much unto us, and required our acceptations of his present; but we would not allow his Petition, but had fully determined againe to send our Army against the said King of Poland; but the Ambassador of your Majestie remaining in our blessed Port, interposing himselfe, and signifying that he did assist your Excellency with Corne, Gun-powder, Masts, and other things, necessary for warre, out of the confines of Polonia; now when as the Kingdome of Polonia by our meanes was troubled, and your Ambassador declared unto us your singular and peculiar pleasure, the same his declaration and intercession was unto us gratefull and acceptable, and your Excellency to whom we owe all favours and honour. We wrote our Letters to the King of Polonia on this manner; that the said factious wicked persons and Cosackes should be found out and fully punished, but if on the behalfe of your Majesty, a loving league of peace had not beene sollicited for the King of Poland, we would not by any meanes have entred League with him, but onely at your request we have shewed this grace to the said King and his Subiects, and sith our familiarity is mutuall and perpetuall, we thinke it convenient that your Majesty joyning your selfe with the Kingdome of Polonia, doe not leave to continue warre with the King of Spaine, who so long time hath kept warre against you; and if your Majesty be not grieved to write unto us by some trusty man, we vow, by the aide of the Omnipotent Creator, that all necessary things shall be on our part finished and ordered, that a speedy dispatch may be made into Spaine, *wherein for our parts no assistance shall be wanting, whereof you may nothing doubt. But from these farre travels, long and chargeable adventures, let us returne to our neerer home proceedings, under the Government of our prudent Queene Sheba.

(151) Gregory, of that name the thirteenth, and stout stirring man of Rome: seeing Pope Pius his thunderbolts fall short of the marke whereunto they were aimed, thought it necessary to raise that begun foundation, (though with ill burnt bricke, and bad tempred morter) as that his mounted Cannons from the height, might reach and command where the other had left: To which purpose he sollicited Philip King of Spaine, after his fortunes had set him in Portugall Anno 1582. to undertake warre against Queene Elizabeth either directly, or underhand, in favour of the Irish Rebels, unto which charge he offered not only his holy blessing, and spirituall treasure, but also to acquit him of the fruits of the Archbishopricke of Toledo, long retained in his hands, whilest the Archbishop remained suspended, and the King received some millions of Crownes, which the Pope claimed to belong unto the See of Rome. But Philip not yet ready to attempt upon England, joyned with him for the conquest of Ireland; the one sending fixe hundred men under the command of Thomas Stukely, whom he had lately stiled Marquesse of Ireland, (a profuse and defamed person throughout all Christendome, flying out of England for his many Piracies, and now imploied to follow the consecrated Standard of the Church;) the other, bearing all the charge, with an addition of three hundred Spaniards, sending money with them to wage foure thousand men more; and the more to kindle the flames of Rebellions, Doctor Sanders (the Arch-Rebell and English Fugitive) was sent from the Popes holy side.

the Country should shortly know wherefore they were come: and Desmond, a man desperate to evill, put in action by papall authoritie, had laid his hopes no lower (by these aides now arrived) then presently to become the sole King of Ireland, as Benhadad boasted over Israel before his harnesse was put on.

(153) To salute this puppet King, and to welcome these papals with such entertainment as his martiall sword would allow, Arthur Lord Grey Baron of Wilton, then Deputy of Ireland, hasted to Dingle, and so to Del-Ore, where he had them to sir sharpe a banquet, that all the Spaniards, Italians, and Biscayes, notwithstanding their bragging bravadoes yeelded their weapons at the first brunt, and upon the points of the adversaries, died without mercy; the Captaines, Coronell, Secretary and few more reserved for ransome. The Fort they had stored with money, Bisket, Bacon, Oile and Wine, sufficient to hold out the space of sixe moneths, and furnished with powder, shot, and armour sufficiently for two thousand men: with them all the Irish as well women as men died; and Desmond driven into extreame want, fearing the pricke of every thorne, and the shadow of every bush, notwithstanding he was armed with an Agnus Dei, and an enchanted ring sent from the Popes owne finger hung about his necke, yet could he not keepe his traiterous head upon his shoulders; when like a wolfe wandering in the woods for his prey, was in a poore Cottage wonded by a Souldier rushing in upon him, and being knowne was presently cut shorter by the head. But with his end, ended not the troubles of Ireland, especially those parts of Vlster, that lay most remote from England.

(154) And whereunto, Walter Earle of Essex, accompanied with the Lord Rich, and others, had formerly made an expedition, aswell to reduce those wilde Irish unto a more civill life and respective obedience unto the English Crowne, as to winne them to the knowledge of Christ, whom they most ignorantly worshipped. But the death of this Nobleman hapening before his intendments could bee accomplished, left that to be followed by others which himselfe had begun.

(155) The troubles of which Province we have partly touched unto the death of Shan O-Neale, whose Seginories by Parliament were invested into the Queenes hands, and a Law enacted, that from thence forth no man should assume the name or title of O-Neale. After which some small blasts of peace breathed upon those parts; till shortly Turlogh Leinigh, a brothers sonne of Con-More the Grandfather of this Shan, by a popular election tooke that stile upon him, a man stept farre in yeares, which made him more quiet, and much the rather for feare of Shan O-Neales sonnes, but especially of Hugh Baron of Dungannon the sonne of bastard Mathew, unto whom he had given his daughter in Marriage, and the said Baron had lately repudiated and cast off.

(156) This Turlogh was most obsequious and serviceable to Queene Elizabeth, stirring no troubles to the English, though to his neighbours the Irish he proved most sterne: For, O-Donell he disquieted, the Scots of the Islands; he molested, and in an incounter slew Alexander Oge the slayer of Shan O-Neale; and indeed became so fearefull, that his sonne in law Hugh, lay hid from him in his owne Country, and lastly escaped his hands into England, where to raise himselfe from his obscure estate and condition, hee got command of a troupe of Horse, with a pension of a thousand markes by yeare from the Queene. Whose service against the Rebellious Desmond, was so well performed and accepted, that he obtained the place and title of Earle of Tir-Oen, pleading the Letters patent of King Henry the eight, granted to his Grand-father, and his heires males, where of himselfe was the sonne of Mathew, created Baron of Dungannon by the same King. Thus growne unto greatnesse, old Turlogh upon certaine conditions, resigned unto him the Government of Vlster, where shortly combining himselfe with the men of most might, they together associated their strengths to defend the Romish religion, for that was the mantle that ever covered their hatched rebellions.

(157) The first Champion that founded the Alarum was Mac-Guyre a man of a turbulent spirit, thrust forward by Guaran a Priest, whom Pope Vrban the second had ordained Primate of Ireland, commanding him in the name of God to fight there the Lords Battaile, affuring him by his Apostolicall warrant, of most fortunate proceedings, and happy successe. But see how this great Prophet was deceived; for by the valour of Sir Richard Bingham, Mac-Guyre was discomfited, and the primate Priest slaine in the field.

Mac Guyre.

Guaran bought his primacy at a deere rate.

(158) The Confederacie thus broken, Mac-Guyre set himselfe for open rebellion; whom Tir-Oen in shew of his dutifull obedience pursueth, and was so forward in service; that he received a wound. in his thigh to his no little honour. Whereupon he became of greater respect in the English Court, and more enhaunsed in his owne esteeme; so that he feared not to exhibite Complaints against the Lord Deputy Sir William Fitz-Williams, the Marshall, whose sister hee had married, and the Garrisons souldiers that Guarded those parts. But the Deputy recalled, and Sir William Russell appointed in his place; as if all quarrels had beene quite forgotten, he came unto the new Lord Deputy, and exhibited an humble submission upon his knees, wherein he dolefully expressed his inward griefe, in that her Majestie had conceived some indignation against him. His absenting himselfe from the State, he confessed was disagreeable to his obedience, albeit to be somewhat excused by the hard measure (as he alledged) of the late Deputy, and Marshall, that were combined for his destruction. Hee acknowledged that the Queenes Majestie had advanced him in title, dignitie and great livings, and himselfe unworthy of any, but rather dishonour and ruine, if hee should become ungratefull unto so good a Princesse. With these & the like complements of his true heart and meaning, he posseſt the Counsell of Ireland, that albeit Sir Henry Bagnall the Marshall was presēt, and charged him with many subornations of Mac-Guyre, the Primate, the beſiege of Inis-Kellin and others, hee was by them dismissed and sent home, to the great discontent of the Queene, and disquietnesse of the Land, as afterward followed, and in course of time and story shall be declared.

(159) Long before these last Irish troubles, (as you may obserue in the relation of some former attempts against the Queene) the brands of dissention were blowne into flames, betwixt Queene Elizabeth of England, and Philip the second of that Name, King of Spaine; whose first breaking forth was in the Netherlanders cause, the one persecuting, and the other defending the Religion that those people profest; and thus it began. In the yeare of Grace 1575, Don Lewis, Governour of those Low-Countries for the said King, sent his Agent unto Queene Elizabeth, desiring her to banish such of them as repayred to England, onely flight, and their religion, all the cause alledged against them.

Don Lewis sent to have the Netherlanders banished out of England.

(160) Her answer was short, and nothing acceptable, that thee held it unworthy the Majesty of a Prince, to chase away those poore exiled and scattered Netherlanders, that were fled into her Dominions, for the safetie of their lives, and to avoid the Spanish tyranny, exercised onely in case of their consciences. And yet the forbade some men of speciall note, as also such as bare armes, to enter England, upon condition that Westmorland should bee banished the Low-Countries, with such other Rebels as had fled to the Spaniard. But the Clergy intending to bring their Spanish Inquisition into those parts, the Prince of Orange entred conference with the States of Holland and Zeland, touching the defence fence of their professed religion, and the preservation of their distressed Countries, unable of themselves (as was alleaged) long to defend themselves, and therefore it was thought fitteſt to choose them a Protector.

(161) This passing for currant among the Counsellors of estate, three were in name, the Emperour, the French King, and the Queene of England; for they were past all hope of any assurance with Spaine Yea of these in choise, some excepted against, as neither safe nor convenient to be yeelded unto. Against the Emperor was alleaged the diversities of religion, the small union of those Germane Princes, and having their hands full to keepe their owne at home, would bee the lesse able to assist with helpe abroad. The French (they feared) had wasted their money the onely meanes for warre) with their owne civill dissentions; if not, yet might they hardly bee trusted, as witnessed the cruell massacre lately committed. England then was the Pillar to which they must leane; their Queene the greateſt of all Christian Princes, their Navy the Commandresse of the Seas, and their people professing the same Religion with them, the sureſt band of Christian society: further it was alleaged that the Realmes of Denmarke and Sweden desired it, the County of Emdem and the Hanse Townes in the East intreated for it, Brabant and Flanders sought it; yea and the rightfull Title of the Princesse Elizabeth, issued from the Earles of Holland, and Zeeland by the Lady Philip, daughter to William the third of that name, Earle of Henault and Holland, did warrant it.

(162) Thus then concluded, the States were sent unto England, and made the end of their comming knowne to the Queene; who wisely weighing into what a Labirinth shee should enter, fought rather the safety of her owne, then to consent to their motion; for Spaine shee well knew would storme at the Vnion, and France bee in great jealousie to have such a neighbour; shee therefore promising to bee a mediator unto the King of Spaine for their peace; and after some complements of Princely entertainements, with thankes for their offer, and sufferance to carry with them many voluntary English souldiers, let them depart: whose deniall made knowne, was nothing welcome to those distressed Provinces.

(163) Long after this, Lewis the Governour lived not, whom Don Iohn of Austria (base brother to King Philip) succeeded; who at first made shew of most favourable affection, yet so, as urging their subjection to Spaine; and obedience to the Apostolicall See of Rome. Neither would hee come to their Counsell, without Hostages delivered, and most of their troupes to guard his suspecting person, esteeming them Lutherans and Heretikes, in whom was no trust.

(164) These mooved the States once more to sue to Her Majesty, that by her meanes, with peace they might enjoy the ancient Priviledges of their Provinces, and the freedome of their owne consciences against the Inquisition and Tyranny of Spaine; and indeed so lamentably deplored their case, that the pitty-full Queene sent into Spaine, to desire the King in commiseration to withdraw these extremities from the distressed. But Philip deafe on that eare, and Iohn planting his Garrisons with suspicious intents, Elizabeth began to looke to the maine, sending the King word, Shee liked not that his Souldiers should bee Her bad neighbours, and the Governour notice, that shee would not suffer the Christian Netherlanders to be tyrannized by his Spaniards. And thereupon caused the value of forty thousand Angels in Bullion, unminted (in part of an hundred thousand pound sterling promised) to bee sent unto Brussels, receiving the States obligations for the same: where also were confirmed certaine conditions betwixt Her and them.

(165) This mooved Don Iohn to such conceits, that he intended to doe wonders in England, by interposing himselfe in the Scottish affaires, yea, and by the destruction of Queene Elizabeth, whereto he is said to have got the Popes good furtherance. But whether by poyson or discontents, this great conceited Monarch left the Crowne of England where it gloriously stood, and laid his owne head in the grave of death.

John de Serres. pag. 889.

(166) And indeed so glorious was Elizabeths fame, growne now more potent by the Low-Countries engagements, that the wise Statists of France, feared their owne Starre would bee dimmed at the presence of Her bright Sunne. For Henry their King, though he made great shewes to doe much, both in the Church and Councell of State; in feasts, in maskes, and in treading the measures of dances, dallied out both day and night in unmeasurable delights: and yet the Clergy to hold in their owne hands the raines of Church government, with Bels, Bookes, and Beads, founded forth the zeale of his religious piety in the eares of their auditories: And to manage all remporall affaires at their owne dispose, the Queene Mother, and the Guize laid loose the bridle in his owne necke, not abridging his pleasures with their graver advices. But left the English Maiden Queene should be a maule to the Churchmens Maſſings, or disturbe these State-guiders by claime (as thee had done) of Her owne right in France; the marriage motioned nine yeeres before, betwixt their Kings brother Francis Valois Duke of Anjou, and Elizabeth England's faire Queene, was againe sollicited, in hope by this match to make her wholly theirs, the better to establish their peace: and so effectually was the sute mooved, and so acceptably heard of Her Majesty, that the Mounsieur came over in person to wooe Her himselfe; though to the little liking of many Nobles, and great discontent to the Commons, as (amongst other appearances) was made knowne by a booke written against it, for which by reason of some personall and over-lavish passages) the * Inditer lost his hand. But whether Her Majesty affected not marriage, or disliked the man, or else out of Her tender care not to give the least griefe or distaste to Her Subjects, after most Princely and magnificent entertainement Shee let him depart without any promise of a nuptiall knot.

(167) The fame of this Duke was very renowned, and much the more by the English Queenes favours; in so much, that the distressed united Provinces, after they had declared Philip of Austria (then King of Spaine) by his too violent Government against their priviledges (whereunto hee had sworne) to bee an enemy unto their state and peace, and therefore upon breach of covenants, to have falne from his interest among them, chose this hopefull Mounsieur to be their Protector, as a Prince most powerfull to defend their cause; of whose triumphes and French trecheries there, let Serres and Petit report for me.

Conſiderations why it behoved to aſſiſt the Low-Countries

(170) Her Councell then aſſembled to conferre of the buſineſſe, many waighty conſiderations amongſt them were mooved, and laſtly concluded, that her Majeſty ought to accept of the offer. The defence of Gods goſſpell was the firſt motive, ſhe being the nurſing mother of Chriſts diſtreſſed Saints: The Spaniſh Inquiſition, that without reſpect had perſecuted her Subjects contrary to right, was too cruell to bee tollerated: Philips Army with flying colours ſent lately into Ireland upon gift made unto him by the Pope, with a purpoſe of the like enterprize for England; bewrayed their intents; and laſtly the hard meaſure that was to bee expected for England, if the Spaniards ſeated in theſe neere Netherland Provinces was to be prevented. Theſe important reaſons for her owne State, and pitty of theirs, mooved her Majeſty to become their Defender, but would in no wiſe take the Title of Soveraigne Lady thereof, which they would have conferred upon Her, and Her heires.

For which monies ſo diſburſed, the Townes of Fluſhing and Brill, with two Skonces, and the Caſtle of Ramekins in Holland, were delivered to Her Majeſties uſe in pledge, untill the money were repayred: theſe Covenants were dated at Nonſuch the tenth of Auguſt in Anno 1585.

(172) This protection, undertaken by the Queene of England, was very ill taken by King Philip of Spaine; neither better digeſted by the Pope his holy Father, as was ſhewed in two lying libels publiſhed againſt Her: where amongſt other things, ſhee was taxed with Ingratitude towards King Philip, who in the raigne of Her ſiſter, was ſaid to have ſaved her life, and that treacherouſly ſhe had fought the death of the Prince of Parma the preſent Governour in thoſe parts under the ſaid King, unto which impudent ſlanders ſhee made anſwer in a booke printed both in Engliſh and French, ſhewing the ſhamefull untruth of thoſe impoſturous lyers, and the reaſons that led her to aſſiſt thoſe poore diſtreſſed States, whereof theſe were a part.

For teſtimony of which there are extant ſundry Authentique treatiſes and tranſactions for mutuall commerce, intercourſe and ſtraite amity of ancient times; as betwixt King Henry the ſixth, and Philip the Second Duke of Burgundy; which was revived by Duke Charles his ſonne (Father to the King of Spaines Grand-mother, and husband to the Lady Margaret, ſiſter to King Edward the fourth) and againe confirmed by King Henry the ſeventh, and the Arch-Duke Philip, Grand-father to the King of Spaine. And of later yeares betwixt King Henry the eight, and Charles the fifth, Emperour of Almaine, Father to Philip now King of Spaine. In all which treatiſes it was at all times ſpecially contained in expreſſe words, that the naturall people and Subjects of either ſide ſhould ſhew mutuall favours and duties one to the other: But now Philip of Spaine departing the Low-Countries, and appointing Spaniards, Forreiners and Strangers, men exerciſed in warre, and delighted in blood to bee chiefe Governours of all the ſaid Low-Countries, contrary to their ancient Lawes and cuſtomes, who upon ambition, and for private lucre have violently broken the Liberties, as the people alledge; and in a tyrannous fort have baniſhed, killed and deſtroyed within the ſpace of a few moneths many of the moſt ancient and principall perſons, of the naturall Nobility, have brought in inteſtine warres, made the Country in a manner deſolate by famine, ſword, and other exactions. So that the people are forced for the ſafety of their lives to ſeeke the protection of other forraine Lords, or rather to yeeld themſelves wholly to the ſoveraignty of ſome mighty Monarch, as not onely by the ancient Lawes of their Countries they may, but even by ſpeciall priviledges granted to the people by ſome of the Lords and Dukes of the Provinces as they doe affirme, whereby they are free from their former homages, and at liberty to make choice of any other to be their Prince, and head.

(174) Beſides theſe reaſons concerning them, the practiſes of Bernardin de Mendoza (Lieger-Ambaſſador in England for Philip King of Spaine) who by the directions of Francis Throgmorton, contrived to bring in a forraine power to the deſtruction of Englands eſtate, it was not onely held a worke of piety to defend theſe diſtreſſed Chriſtians, but alſo a neceſſary policy to ayde the Low-Countries Proteſtants with Englands ſupply, the better to impeach theſe dangerous deſignes. And how joyous her protection was to theſe Provinces, the delivery of Fluſhing with the Caſtle of Ramekins unto Sir Philip Sidney, and the Brill unto Sir Thomas Cecill, appointed by Her Majeſty the Governours thereof, is witneſſed by the letters of Prince Maurice himſelfe, wherein he ſignified the great joy and hopes that hee conceived, and his willing ſurrender of the ſame towne Fluſhing, being his patrimoniall inheritance.

(176) The States having drawne inſtructions of Counſell for their Countries affaires, preſented the ſame to their new made Governour, whoſe anſwer was, that ſuch inſtructions would proove limitations, which his authority now being abſolute, could no wayes indure: they greatly miſtruſting whereat hee did ayme, bewailed the miſeries whereunto their Country ſeemed to be brought, yet they ſuffered him to chooſe his Counſellors of Eſtate, and to ſtampe his owne Armes both in their great and Counter-Seale: which when the Queene their aſſiſter underſtood, ſhee was offended both with them and him, ſuppoſing her ſelfe to bee drawne further then ever ſhee intended, or that thee had yeelded unto in the Declaration, where her ſelfe had granted to bee their Ayder, but never would grant to bee the Soveraigne of thoſe Countries.

(177) Things thus paſſing betwixt England and the United Provinces, the Engliſh Marchants Ships and goods were arreſted in Spaine, which cauſed many to leave the trade of Merchandizing, and to become men of Warre on the Seas, where alwayes the Spaniard, whoſoever wanne, went to the worſt. But on the Land, the Prince of Parma held Play; for whoſe further ſafety Pope Sixtus the fift ſent him a conſecrated Sword with a Hatte, and to his men of Warre the Apoſtolicall bleſſing, with eternall life for them that ſhould dye in the Catholike Romiſh faith.

(178) Another feare was blowne into the Netherlanders eares, which ſore troubled them though without all cauſe, for it was divulged by ſiniſter reports, that Queene Elizabeth meant to make peace with the King of Spaine, without either mention or regard for the ſafety of her united Confederates. Shee touched in honour, whereof ſhee was ever jealous, wrote her letters to Prince Parma in anſwer of his, that had mentioned the ſame, and to theſe doubtfull Netherlanders, to aſſure them the contrary, both which were dated from Richmond upon one, and the ſame day.

(179) Now Leiceſter not liking to lye ſtill, and doe nothing, made his preparation for Zutphen, which being in want of victuals, the Prince of Parma ſought to ſupply, to intercept which, Sir Iohn Norris was ſent, and to the ſaid ſervice came the Earle of Eſſex, the Lord Willoughby, Sir Philip Sidney, Sir William Stanley, and Sir William Ruſſell, in all two hundred horſe, and fifteene hundred Musketiers and Pikes: the Parma having ſeven hundred horſe, and two thouſand foote, appointed with the like defence.

A conflict at Zutphen.

(180) The day being darke through great foggy miſts, the Spaniard whileſt their Wagons made forward, ſtayed in a place of advantage neere unto Zutphen, upon whom the Engliſh were entred before they were aware, and were entertained with a furious charge of ſhot, which notwithſtanding they abode, and ſo valiantly followed the skirmiſh, that they overthrew a cornet of horſe, and tooke Creſpier the Captaine thereof priſoner, and after him Count Hanniball Gonzaga, another Cornet alſo they put backe and ſlew. But in this the day was made unfortunate, that the worthy Sir Philip Sidney as hee changed his horſe, was ſhot by a Musket above the left knee, which ſo ſhivered the thigh-bone, that the Bullet could not bee recovered, of which wound hee dyed five and twenty dayes after, to the no little griefe of her Majeſty, and many others, for the great hopes they had of that worthy Gentleman, in whom were compleat all vertues and valours that could bee required or reſiding in man.

Sir Philip Sidney ſhot with a muſket, whereof he dyed.

(181) Good ſervice done upon the Sconces neere Zutphen, ſo that that Towne ſeemed to bee blocked up; his Excellency (ſo did they now enſtile the Earle) made Rowland Yorke the Governour thereof, and over Deventer Sir William Stanley, to the great diſcontents of the Eſtates, for that Yorke had beene a double Traitor in ſervice, and Stanley before time had ſerved the Spaniard. Other grievances alſo they then began to complaine of, and by petition to his Excellency fought the redreſſe; but hee minding for England, with faire words held them in expectance untill ſuch time as hee ſhould returne againe.

Yorke and Stanley made governours of townes.

And the Earle of Hollocke held himſelfe much wronged, in that Sir Edward Norris upon words ſpoken at Table, ſent him a letter of challenge to fight with him body to body; the Earle then lying ſicke of a wound received at Zutphen, which hee diſdainefully tooke, as being his unequall, and partly imputed it to the ſufferance of his Excellency. But more neerely touched the loſſe of Deventer and Sconce at the Zutphen, traiterouſly ſold unto the Spaniard by Sir William Stanley, and Rowland Yorke Engliſhmen, whom Leiceſter had left there at his departure. (183) The occaſion that mooved the Lord Generall to returne into England, was for his preſence in Parliament, wherein was handled the waighty cauſe of that great Princeſſe Mary Queene of Scotland, whoſe untimely death and unfortunate end was finiſhed at Fotheringhay Caſtle in the County of Northampton, to the great diſcontent of her Majeſty, as was manifeſtly ſeene * to all her people, by the griefe ſhee conceived, and high diſpleaſure ſhe tooke againſt the forward * Actor, both in caſting him into the Tower of London, and never admitting him after into her preſence, or his place. The body of the deplored Queene was ſolemnely interred in the Cathedrall Church of Peterborow, where it remained under a Hearſe of blacke velvet. But by his Majeſties appointment was thence removed unto the Collegiat Church of Saint Peters in Weſtminſter, and in the moſt magnificent Chappell of King Henry the VII. interred under a Princely Monument of white marble, with her picture according to life artificially imitated by ſculpture.

(186) The care of preventing further miſchiefes, moved her Majeſty hereupon to recall the Earle of Leiceſter into England, well knowing that a Kingdome divided could not long ſtand: who on his returne, ſhee commanded to reſigne his government of the Netherlanders into the hands of the Generall Eſtates, which was performed by act, ſigned under his hand, and ſent unto them: which reſignation received, was preſently proclaimed through all the Provinces, to the end that every man might know himſelfe diſcharged of his oath to the Earle of Leiceſter.

Commissioners for the pretended peace.

Variance for precedency.

(190) The demand of the Queene was, to have a surceasse of Armes, with a present and undelayed truce, mistrusting the Kings preparation at Sea. The sending away of forraine souldiers out of the Low-Countries for Englands safety. A restitution of such summes of money as the Queene had lent unto the Estates, which the King had promised by his Edict made at Brusels. That the Netherlanders might enjoy their ancient liberties and priviledges, nor bee governed by a stranger, but by a Native Prince. That the Religion might bee permitted for two yeeres at least. And lastly, that the Articles of Pacification of Gaunt, and other like Treaties might bee observed. And these being concluded; the Townes shee possessed should bee delivered upon such reasonable conditions, as all the world should witnesse shee tooke them not to her owne use, or commodity, but onely upon a necessary defence and assurance.

The Queenes demands.

(191) To these the Spaniards replyed, that touching their preparation for Sea, they did assure them it nothing concerned England. To send away their Souldiers, their King could not resolve; untill that the Netherlanders had submitted themselves unto him. Concerning their priviledges, it appertained nothing to the Queene, neither should shee prescribe to the King a Law. And so farre was hee from tolerating Religion, that hee would not heare thereof, otherwise then hee had allowed unto other Townes that had submitted unto his obedience: and the like answer made they for the Pacification of Gaunt.

The Spanish shifts and answers.

(192) The propositions further urged, and answered with dilatory delayes, Pope Sixtus the fift (the prime man in the intended Tragedy) observing well the time, among other beasts sent forth his Bull to thunder out bolts against Englands Queene, confirming the Excommunications of his two Predecessors, and depriving Her Majesty from all Princely dignity; for whose finall dispossession, hee then ordained his Catholike Sonne Philip of Spaine, commanding all Her Subjects, upon paine of his curse, (oh fearefull bugge-beare) to ayde and assist the great, noble, and invincible Army, prepared to that end under the command of the Duke of Parma. And Allen an Englishman, an eager Trumpeter to this exploit, now purposely made Cardinall by the Pope (to shew his Holy affection to the English Nation) would not lye idle, but set himselfe on worke to write a Booke exhortatory to the Nobility of England and Ireland, to rouze them up to the execution of the Popes sentence against their Soveraigne, in assisting King Philip, who was made the whip in his Holinesse hand, and the Duke of Parma who was appointed the chiefe Commander in that action, which Booke (fraught with all impudency of divellish slanders against her sacred person) was printed at Antwerpe in Anno 1588.

The Popes Bull sent forth against England.

Cardinall Allens trayterous libell.

(193) This Bull and Booke comming to the Queenes knowledge; She sent unto Parma (who had gained the reputation of some Princely vertues) to deale plainely with her; if so, then meant she no longer to continue the treaty of peace: but he with many Courtly complements denyed his authority, neither had seene (as he said) any such prescripts. Moreover the English Commissioners pressed the conditions, purposely to find some footsteps of this close-carried designe, when at last it burst forth in these termes, that the King of Spaine had kept fifty thousand men in pay almost a whole yeere to lye still and doe nothing, to his great charge by the meanes of that treaty. At which very instant, these their hidden traps and toyles apparantly shewed themselves, when the Seas were turretted with such a Navy of ships; as Her swelling waves could hardly be seene, and the Flagges, Streamers, and ensignes, so spread in the winde, that they seemed to darken even the Sunne, which put the English Commissioners in some suspition and feare, having no hostages for their safe returne.

Sent to Prince Parma.

The Spanish purpose made knowne by themselves.

(194) This Invincible Navie long in preparing and now in readinesse, was furnished with all provisions of warre, and with many bravadoes spread their sailes for Englands invasion, guided by the Provinciall Generals, whose names the numbers of Vessels, Ordonances, Sailers, Souldiers, and Slaves, as I find them recorded, in this ensuing Table are inserted.

The wonderfull and great provisions in the Spanish Armado.

(195) Admirable (as ye see) was the provision of this mighty Armado, and so confident was the Spaniard that England should pay the whole shot, that no coft of any thing was at all spared; of bullets for great shot were two hundred and twenty thousand; of powder foure thousand and two hundred kintals, every kintall containing a hundred weight; of lead for bullets one thousand kintals, and one thousand and two hundred kintals of match; seven thousand Muskers and Calivers, ten thousand Partizans and Halberts, with murthering Peeces, double Canons, and field Peeces for Campe; with store of furniture for carriages, Mules and Horses, so that they were sufficiently provided both for Sea and Land. Bread and Bisket was baked, and Wine laid aboard for sixe moneths provition; sixe thousand and five hundred kintals of Bacon, three thousand of Cheese, besides flesh, Rice, Beanes, Pease, Oyle, and Vinegar, with twelve thousand Pipes of fresh water, store they had of Torches, Lanthornes, and Lampes, Canuas, Hides, and Lead to stop-leakes, whips, and butchery knives; for what use wee may imagine. In a word, by the report of Don Diego Piementell, the Army was two and thirty thousand strong, and cost the King of Spaine thirty thousand Ducats every day.

Their Regiments.

(196) In this Army were five regiments of old Spanish Souldiers, of the Tertias, of Naples, Sicily, and the Terceraes, commanded by five Masters Del Campo; The first was Don Diego de Piementell, a Knight of the Order of Saint Iohn, brother to the Marquesse of Taveras, and Cousen to the Earle of Benevent and Calvi. The second Colonell was Don Francisco de Toledo, brother to the Earle of Orgas: the third, Don Alonzo de Luzon: the fourth, Don Nicholas de Illa, or Patritio Anselmo: and the fift, was Augustin Mexia, brother to the Marquesse de la Garda, who was afterwards made Governour of Antwerp; each company having in his regiment two and thirty companies, besides the Castilians and Portugals bands, each of them having their peculiar Governours, Captaines, Officers, Colours, and weapons.

Their great strength in men.

Their General.

(197) The Generall of this mighty army, was Don Lodovicus Perez, Duke of Medina Sidonia, Baron of S'. Lucas, of the Order of the Golden Fleece. The Admirall was Don Iohn Martinez de Richald, the Marshall Don Francisco Bovadille: and the chiefe Counsellers for the warre, were Diego Piementell, Ploris de Valdez, Pedro de Valdez, Michael Oquendo, Don Alanzo de Lieva, Don Diego Maldonado, and Don Georgio Manriquez. Don Martin Alorcon was ordained Vicar Generall for the holy Inquisition, in whose traine were a hundred Monkes and Iesuites: and Cardinall Allen was appointed the Superintendent of all Ecclesiasticall matters throughout England; who fearing to bee overtaken with time, translated Pope Sixtus his Bull into English, that it might be the sooner published upon the arrivall of the Spanish Fleete into that Kingdome. Of voluntary adventurers, were an hundred twenty foure Noblemen, and Gentlemen of great account; all of them furnished at their owne charges: among whom was the Prince of Ascoli, Alonzo de Leiva, the Marquesse of Pennafiel, the Marquesse de Ganes, the Marquesse de Barlango, the Count de Paredes, the Count de Telluas, and divers other Marquesses and Earles of Honourable Families of Mendoza, Toledo, Pacheco, Cordovat, Cuzma, and Manriques, neither was there any Noble House of Spaine, but had a son, brother or nephew in the voyage, in hope of revenewes & riches in England.

(198) Nor was the Duke of Parma slacke in the businesse; who lying in readinesse to joyne his forces with this Navy, set many thousands on worke to build ships, to dig and deepen Rivers for sayle from Antwerpe to Gaunt, and to Bruges, lading three hundred small Boates with Munition and victuals; as also prepared seventy others flat bottomed, every one able to beare thirty Horses for transportation, with Bridges ready made to ship and unship them. Two hundred more were made of the like fashion, though not so big, and lay ready in the Haven of Newport; at Dunkirke lay thirty seven ships of warre, wherein store of pyles were bestowed, sharpened at the end with yron pykes, to pile up the mouthes of Rivers; and at Gravelling he had provided twenty thousand empty Caskes, with Cords, and other furniture fit to make floating Bridges to stop up the Havens. Hee likewise had shipped great abundance of Saddles, Bridles, with all other furniture for Horse; and Horses also for carriage, with Ordonance, and other provisions of warre.

(199) Neere unto Newport hee had lying under the command of Camillo, thirty Companies of Italians, two of Wallons, and eight of Burguinois, every Company being an hundred men. At Dyxmew he mustered fourescore Companies of Netherlanders, threescore of Spaniards, threescore of high Dutch, and seven of rebellious fugitive English, whereof Sir William Stanley was Generall; at Corricke also were foure thousand lodged, and at Watene nine hundred Horse, over whom the Marquesse of Guast was Commander. And to this Land-service came the Duke of Paitrana, supposed to bee the Spanish Kings base sonne: the Marquesse of Bourgon, one of the Archduke Ferdinands sonnes, Don Vespasian Gonsagua of the House of Mantua, a great Souldier, who had beene Viceroy of Spaine, Don Iohn de Medices Bastard of Florence, Don Amedeus bastard of Savoy, with many others of the like estate.

The Noblemen employed in this Armada.

(200) Neither must you thinke, that Sixtus Quintus the Pope of Rome, did in any wise neglect his diligence and devotion to this intended invasion; whose helping hand was shewed, in sending forth his Crusado (as hath beene used against the Turkes) and publishing a safe passport for his Philippians to enter into England. Who also for the furtherance of the enterprise, undertooke to contribute a million of gold, the halfe presently, and the other when any notable Haven in that Land should bee wonne; with this proviso notwithstanding (most wisely inferred) that hee should hold the English Crowne as feudatory unto the See of Rome; in earnest whereof, he bestowed upon him his Apostolicall benediction, and the Title of the Defender of the Faith: so liberall was he, both in his temporall and spirituall largesses, and so forward was Philip to catch at Elizabeths still flourishing Crowne. But her undaunted heart in this present danger, as another Ezekiah, sought unto the Lord, whose Annointed servant shee was, and who ever had beene her onely defendant. And for preventing those long threatned stormes, shee sent Charles Howard, Lord Baron of Effingham, High Admirall of England, unto the Seas, where the Lord Henry Seymer kept betwixt Callis and Dover, seconded by the Ships of united Provinces, in league with the Queene.

The Popes Crusado.

His contribution.

(201) The French King, who ever honoured and admired Queene Elizabeths great and gracious vertues, having more particular intelligences that this great preparation was made against England, gave speedy and secret notice thereof to her Majesty; whereupon shee commanded the generall Forces of the Realme in their severall Shires to be mustered, trayned, and put in readinesse for the defence of the whole; which accordingly was done, and whereof the Lord Robert Dudley, Earle of Leicester, and Steward of her Household, was appointed Lieutenant. Tilbury in Essex was the place for the Campe, whereunto were appointed 15000. Horsemen, and twenty two thousand of Foote, and to guard her Majesties Person, out of the severall Counties of the West, East, and South parts of England, were selected two thousand, three hundred, fifty two Horsemen, and thirty foure thousand and fifty of Foote; her selfe in courage farre surmounting her Sex, as another Zenobia, or rather Deborah, led forth the Lords Hoast against this great Sisera, and her Souldiers valiant for warre, and apt for battell, Men skilfull to handle Speare and Shield, both for courage and quicke dispatch, might well be compared unto those Gadites that came to ayde David, whose faces were like to the faces of Lyons, and were compared to Roes in the Mountaines for swiftnesse.

The French King gives notice to the Queene of the preparation.

(202) The Invincible Navy, and terror of Europe, as the Papals both termed, and tooke it to be, having all things prepared, loosed Anchor from Lisbon, upon the nineteenth of May, and made unto the Groine in Gallicia, it being the nerest haven to England, whence hoysing sayles with great hope and pride, bent their course thitherward: but suddenly the Heavens hating such hostile actions, powred downe revenge, by a sore and unexpected tempest, which drave the Duke of Medina, the chiefe Generall backe againe into the Groine; eight other of their ships being dispersed on Seas, their masts broken and blowne over-board; besides three Portugall Gallies which fell upon the Coast of Bayon in France, and were set upon by their owne slaves, whereof David Gwyn an Englishman was the first, who with fellowes both French and Turkes, freed themselves by the slaughter of many Spaniards, among whom, Don Diego de Mandrana, was one.

A Tempest scatereth the invincible Navy.

(203) Charles Howard, Lord Admirall, hearing for certaine that their Fleete was ready to hoyse up their sayles, had sent the worthy Sir Francis Drake, who was constituted his Vice-Admirall, unto the West parts, with sixty sixe shippes well appointed, whither himselfe also following with speed, and joyning his Fleete, their number amounted to one hundred shippes, whereof fifteene were Victuallers, and nine Voluntaries of Devonshire Gentlemen; many a serviceable man returning backe for lacke of imployment or place. These from Plymouth resolving and * assaying to put forth to Seas, were so met with the wind, that past the Sillies they could not attaine, and thence also were forced by tempest into the Haven, (from whence they lanched) to refresh their ships and Companies; where lying at Ankor, the scouts at Sea had descryed some sayles of the Spaniards, which had beene likewise distressed by the stormes; but before these could be hoysed, the wind came about, and brought them to the Groine, where the rest lay in Harbour.

June 6.

(204) Intelligence spreading that the Spaniards were in want, their great shippes dispersed, the rest storme-shaken, and their men by multitudes dying with the pestilence; the Lord Admirall meant to use the advantage upon the first North-winde, which came about the eight day of July, and bare his sayle almost within sight of Spaine, when suddenly it changing into the South, and hee wisely fore-seeing, that the enemy might passe without his discovery, that the Seas might be stormy, and his Fleete windbound, and that whilest they thus lay abroad, their service much better might bee employed at home, hee therefore presently returned, and ankored his Fleet in the Haven of Plymouth, suffering his men to relieve themselves on Land.

July 8.

(205) But the Spaniards ships new rigged, and their wants supplyed, their King still hote on his former resolutions, instantly urged and haftened his Chiefetaines to put againe to Sea, which accordingly was done upon the eleventh of July, weighing their Ankors at the Groine, where with brave shewes, and ful sayles they came into the Channels of the narrow Seas, where they cast ankor, and dispatched certaine small Pinaces unto the Duke of Parma, to signifie their arrivall and readinesse, and to command him in the name of the King to forward his charge for that service.

The Spaniards againe set forth

(206) The English Fleete being in Harbour, and many men on shore, Captaine Thomas Fleming (some say a Pyrate) descryed the Spaniard upon the point of the Lizard, the wind being then South and by West: Hee haftening to Plimouth, made relation thereof unto the Lord Admirall, the newes was more fearefull, for that it was sudden, the Queene having received intelligence for certaine, that this great Armada would not come forth that yeere, their Bulkes being so dispersed and bruised, and their wants and sickenesse so great, upon which rash reports (a dangerous matter in State affaires,) so confident shee was, that shee sent for foure of her tallest Royall Ships, to bee brought againe unto Chattam; but Flemings unexpected discovery hindred that purpose, and all hands were set on worke to warpe out the Ships, the wind blowing hard, and hindering the same.

The English have notice of their approach.

They set forth from Plimouth

(207) The next day about noone, this terrible Fleete

July. 20.

Fleet was descryed by the English, who with a South-west wind came forward amain, and (as seemed) they made for Plimouth. But whether their Commission were otherwise, or for that they saw the English Ships out of the Harbour, they passed by towards Callis, well hoping about those Coasts to meete with Prince Parma, by whose wafting that way, the English got the wind, and eftsoones gave them chase, and encounter, where fire, smoake, and ecchoing Canons began the parley, and Bullets most freely enterchanged betwixt them, were messengers of each others minde.

The English affaile the Spanish.

July 21.

(208) The next day the two Fleetes fought within Musket shot, where the English Admirall fell most horely on the Vice-Admirall of Spaine, at which present they well perceived their owne overfights; their great Shippes (like Castles) powerfull to defend, but not offend, to stand, but not to move, and therefore farre unfit for fight in those narrow Seas: their enemies nimble, and ready at all sides to annoy them, and as apt to escape harmes themselves, by being low built, and easily shot over. Therefore they gathered themselves close in forme of a halfe Moone, and slackned their Sayles, that their whole Fleete might keepe together. Notwithstanding, one of their great Gallions, wherein was Don Pedro de Valdez, Vasques de Silva, Alonzo de Sayas, and other Noblemen, was fore battered by the English shot; in avoyding whereof, shee fell fowle upon another shippe, and ere shee could be cleared, had her fore-mast broken off, which so hindred her sayle, that shee was unable to keepe way with the Fleet, nor they of courage to succour these Lords, but left both ship, and them, in this sudden, and unlooked for distresse. But night comming on, and shee lagging behind, the Lord Admirall supposing neither men nor Mariners to bee left within board, and fearing to loose sight of the Spaniards, past by, and followed the Lanthorne, which he tooke to bee borne by Sir Francis Drake, but that renowned Knight, busied upon five great Hulkes, pursued them amaine, which being haled, were found to be Easterlings, and thereupon freede from his further harmes.

A Gallion distressed.

July 22.

(209) The next day following, Sir Francis Drake espying this lagging Gallion, sent forth a Pinnace to command them to yeeld, otherwise his Bullets should force them without further favour; but Valdez to seeme valorous, answered; that they were foure hundred, and fifty strong; that himselfe was Don Pedro, and stood on his honour, and thereupon propounded certaine conditions. But the Knight sent his reply, that hee had not leisure to parley, if he would yeeld, presently doe it, if not, he should well prove that Drake was no dastard; whereupon Pedro hearing that it was the fiery Drake, (ever terrible to the Spaniards) who had him in chase, with forty of his followers, came on board Sir Francis his ship; where first giving him the Conge, he protested, that he, and all his, were resolved to die in defence, had they not fallen under his power, whose valour, and felicity was so great, that Mars, and Neptune seemed to attend him in his attempts, and whose generous mind towards the vanquished, had often beene experienced, even of his greatest foes. Sir Francis requiting his Spanish complements with honorable English curtesies, placed him at his owne Table, and lodged him in his owne Cabbin. The refidue of that company were sent unto Plymouth, where they remained eighteene moneths, till their ranfomes were paid; but Sir Francis his Souldiers had well paide themselves with the spoyle of the shippe, wherein were 55. thousand Ducats of gold, which they shared merrily among them. The same day Michael de Oquendo, Admirall to the Quadron Guypuscoa, and Vice-Admirall to the whole Fleete, suffered no lesse distaster, whose ship being one of the greatest Gallions, fell suddenly on fire, all the upper part of the shippe, and most of the persons therein consumed, howbeit the Gunpowder in the hold was all saved, and the rest of the scorched Spaniards with the hulke brought into Plymouth, to the great joy of the beholders.

Don Pedro yeeldeth himselfe.

(210) Vpon Tuesday the twenty third of July, the Spaniards approaching right against Portland, the wind came about into the North, as fit as could be wished to further their designes; but the English agill, and fore-seeing all harmes, recovered the advantage thereof from the Spaniards, and continued that day from morning till night, in battering those vast wooden Castles with shot both great and small; which forced them for their further safety, to gather themselves close into a roundell, their best and greatest Ships standing without, securing the battered and lesse. On this day the foarest fight was performed: wherein, besides other remarkeable harmes, a great Venetian ship, with some other smaller, were surprized, and taken by the English. July 23.

(211) The foure and twenty day of this present Moneth, the fight was onely betweene the foure great Galliasses, and the English ships, the Spaniards having the advantage, theirs being rowed, and our sayles unfilled, by reason of the calme, which notwithstanding they fore galled the enemy with chaine shot, therewith cutting asunder their tacklings, cables, and cordage, to their no little annoyance. But wanting powder, which so freely they had spent, they sent men on Land for further supply, which misinterred diflikes (if not suspitions) to many, that we should thus want upon our own Coast. In which Interim, a Councell was called, wherein it was decreed that the English Fleete should be divided into foure Squadrons, and those committed to foure worthy Captaines, and most skilfull Navigators, whereof the Admirall in the Arke Royall was chiefe, Sir Francis Drake in the Revenge led the second, Captaine Hawkins the third, and Captaine Frobisher the fourth. Other most valiant Captaines there were in her Majesties Shippes, as the Honourable Lord Thomas Howard in the Lyon, the Lord Sheffield in the Beare, Sir Robert Southwell in the Elizabeth Ionas, Captaine Baker in the Victory, and Captaine George Fenner in the Galeon Leicester. July 24.

(212) The five and twenty of July, the Spaniards were arrived against the Isle of Wight, where was a terrible encounter, each shooting off their whole sides, and not above six score yards the one from the other; till at length the English so battered thes paniss high Turrets, that they were forced once more to secure themselves in a roundell, and the foresaid Generals so worthily beare themselves in this conflict, that the Lord Admirall bestowed the Order of Knight-hood upon the Lords Howard and Sheffield, Master Iohn Hawkins, Martin Frobisher, and others. And yet (by the Spanish brags) a false rumour was spread in France, that England was wholly conquered by the Spaniard. July 25.

(213) Their Fleet making forward about Sunset, the 27. of the same Moneth, came against Dover, and anchored within sight of Callis, intending for Dunkerk, there to joyne with the Duke of Parma his Forces, without which, they well saw, they could doe nothing. The English Fleete following up hard upon them, cast anchor so neere, that they lay within Culvering shot. Where the Lord Henry Seymer united his to the Lord Admirals Ships. Meane-while the Duke of Medina sent unto Parma, to bid him make ready his long expected forces; with which messengers many Noblemen of the Spaniards went on Land, among whom was the Prince of Ascoli, the Kings base sonne, who so well liked his shipping, that he made no great haft against from thence: wherein he was onely fortunate; for that his Gallion was cast away upon the Irish coast, and never returned to salute Spaine. July 27.

(214) Duke Parma hearing the best of this voyage, makes all things ready that lay in his charge; whose hopes were so fixed for Englands Conquest, that the glittering Diademe upon Queene Elizabeths head, dazeled his ambitious eye, being assured by Cardinall Allen, that he was the man designed to be crowned therewith, and who, from the Pope, and Spaine should hold that Kingdome himselfe. Wherefore thinking his Coronet of the Low-Countries Government, would but trouble the English Crowne, and both too weighty to be worne upon one Head, hee committed that charge unto Count Mansfield the elder, and making his vowes unto Saint Mary of Hall in Henault, was already in conceit no lesse then a King. But soone the date of his raigne was expired, and his swelling tyde fallen into a low shallow ebbe; for the day following in his march towards Dunkerke, he heard the thundring Ordonance ring the passing peale of his stile, and title, and the same evening had newes of the hard successe of the Spaniards, the hoped advancers of his dreamed fortunes.

The Fleete disanchored from Calis by stratagem.

(215) They lying then at anchor neere Calis, to joyn their powers with Parma's, were forced thence by a politike stratagem thus: Their ships, as Castles pitched in the Seas, had their bulkes so plancked with great beames, that bullets might strike, and sticke, but never passe through, so that little avayled the English Canon, except onely in playing on their masts, and tackling; whereupon, by her Majesties advice, and appointment, eight of the English shippes were discharged of men, and filled with Gun-powder, pitch, brimstone, and other combustible matter; their Ordonance charged with bullets, stones, chaines, and the like; which upon Sunday, the eight, and twenty of July, at two of the clocke after midnight, were let drive with wind, and tyde among the Spanish Fleete, whose Pylots returning, and their traines taking fire, such a sudden thunder-clap was given, that the Spaniards affrighted in the dead of the night, were stricken into a horrible feare, lest all their ships should bee fired by these; which present mischiefe to avoid, in great perplexity, they hasted to cut their owne Cables, the time being to short to weighe up their Anchors; and hoysing their sayles, did drive at randome into the Seas, in which haste and confusion, the greatest of their Galliasses fell foule upon another ship, and lost her Rudder, so that guidelesse shee drove with the tyde upon a shelve in the shoare of Calis, where shee was assaulted by the English.

July 28.

A Gallie taken.

(216) This Galliasse was of Naples; her Generall Hugh de Moncado, who fought the more valiantly in hope of present refcue of the Prince of Parma; but Sir Amias Preston gave so fierce an assault, that Moncado was shot dead with a bullet, and the Galliasse boarded, wherein was many a Spaniard slaine, and a number of the rest leaping into the Sea, were drowned; yet Don Antonio de Matiques, a principall Officer, had the hap to escape; and was the first man that brought into Spaine the welcomes of this now vincible Navy. This huge Bottome, manned with foure hundred Souldiers, and three hundred slaves, had in her also fifty thousand Ducats of the Spanish Kings treasure, a booty well fitting the English Souldiers affections; who having ransacked all, and freed the slaves from their miserable fetters, went about to set that vessell of Emptinesse on fire; but Monsieur Guordon, the Governour of Calis, fearing some danger to the Towne or Haven, would not permit them, but discharged his Ordonance against such as assayed it.

July 29.

(217) The morning after this their miserable hap, ranging themselves againe into order, they approached over against Greveling, where once agayne the English getting the winde, the Spanish were thereby deprived of the Conveniency of Calis roade, and kept from supply out of Dunkerke; in which Port had rested their full hope of support. Notwithstanding, they were forced to passe by, and so followed by the English, that their Shippes discharged upon them from morning till night, the conflict proving dismall to the invincible Armado; for therein a great Gallion of Biscay perished, the Captaines thereof to avoid ignominy, or to bee accounted valorous, desperately flew each others; in which distresse also two other great shippes presently sunke. The Saint Philip, and Saint Matthew, two Portugal Gallions were so torne with shot, their tacklings spent, and their bulkes rent, that the water entred in on all sides; in the former of which, was Francis de Toledo, being Colonell over two and thirty Bands, who taking his course for the Coast of Flanders, the leake was so great, that he with others, committing themselves to the Skiffe, arrived at Ostend, and the ship, with the residue, were taken by the Vlisshingers.

A Gallion taken.

(218) In the Saint Matthew was embarked Don Diego Pimentelli, Count Mayster, and Colonell also of thirty two Bands; whose ship, though very strong, was so pierced with shot, that her Leakes could not be stopt, which knowne, the Duke of Medina sent his Skiffe for him, and some others, to save themselves from their eminent danger. But he, upon a Spanish brave, refused so to doe, assaying each way to free himselfe like a Souldier; but not able to keepe sayle with the Fleete, hee forth-with made toward the Coast of Flanders, where being espyed by five men of warre, was met with, and required to yeeld, which lastly hee did unto Captaine Peter Banderveffe, who carried him into Zeland, where, for a trophy of Victory, his Banner was hung up in the Church of Leyden in Holland, whose length reached from the very roofe unto the ground: and another Ship of lesse burthen, coasting also for Flanders, was cast away on the sands.

(219) The Spaniards now finding their BVENVENIDA unto England farre other then they expected, were content to couch their Fleete close together, not seeking to assayle, but to defend; and the winde comming to the South-west, in the same order passed by Dunkerke, whom the English still followed. But lest Parma should play upon advantage, the Lord Admirall dispatched the Lord Henry Seymer, with his Squadron of small shippes, unto the Coast of Flanders, to second those Hollanders which there kept watch under the conduct of Iustin Nassau their Admirall: whose Navy consisted of thirty five Shippes: furnished with most skilfull Marriners, and old experienced Souldiers, whereof twelve hundred were Musketiers, whom the States had culled out of the Garrisons. Their charge was, to stop all entrance into their Havens, or entercourse with Dunkerke, whither Duke Parma intended, though his men were unwilling, hearing how their friends were welcome at the Sea; onely the English fugitives, about seven hundred, under the command of that treacherous Knight, Sir William Stanley, were very forward to bee the first that should assault England.

The Hollanders Aides.

The Duke of Medina disgraced for his faccellesse sayle.

(220) But the Armado being now passed the place of their expected supply, and having gotten more Sea-roome for their huge bodied Bulkes, * spread their maine sayles, and made away as fast as winde, and water would give them leave, more fearing the small Fleete, and forces of the English, (though nothing in number like unto them) then standing upon termes of honour, either of their chieftaines or Invincible Navy. But surely if they had knowne the want of powder that ours sustained, (a fault unexcusable upon our owne Coasts) they no doubt would have stood longer to their tacklings: but God in this, as the rest, would have us to acknowledge, that wee were onely delivered by his owne gracious providence, and Arme, and not by any policy or power of our owne.

English fugitives prove the most desperate enemies.

* July 30.

(221) The Vincible Armado, holding on their way, the English Admirall followed, lest they should assay to put into Scotland; but the winde comming faire, and feare of more encounters, with all their sayles spread, they betooke themselves to flight, leaving Scotland

The Spanish Armado flyeth.

Scotland on the West, and bending toward Norway; ill advised (but that necessity urged, and God had infatuated their counsels) to put their shaken, and battered bottomes into those blacke & dangerous Seas; neither was the Climate healthfull for the crazed bodies of the Spaniards, over-beaten, and tyred with wants, being now entred the degree of Latitude 57, from whence the Lord Admirall returned, leaving some Scouts to descry their successe.

August 2.

The Spanish consultation.

(222) The Spaniards now cleared from those their haunting spirits, consulted most seriously what was to bee done: the Popes credit was to bee respected, who had predicted this voyage to fortunate successe; the wrath of King Philip was to be feared, his great expences thus lost; the adventurers loosers, if the voyage should bee left, the glory of the Spaniards laid in the suds, the Invincible Navy in the ebbe of her fame: and England still England, not lorded by the Spaniard, if they thus without further attempt should returne into Spaine. But with all, five thousand of their Souldiers were slaine; multitudes of sicke, and maimed lay on their hands, twelve of their greatest ships were sunke, lost, and taken, their Cables, Masts, and Saile, cut, rent, and broken, with the English shot, their anchors left, where the fired Hulkes forced them, their victuals failing, and fresh-water all spent; their enemies no lesse fierce, and undauntable, then fortunate: and their long expected friend, the Duke of Parma thought ever preparing, yet still forestalled by the Dutch, most firme Allies unto the Queene: these circumstances wisely ballanced, the voice went currant for speeding into Spaine.

(223) But knowing that Scotland (whose religious King was fast knit in affection, and blood unto Queene Elizabeth) would yeeld them no comfort, and hopelesse also that Norway would give them any supply, they cast all their Mules, and Horses over boord for sparing of their fresh water: then framing their course to sayle about Cathenes, and the coasts of Ireland, so proceeded between the Orcades, and Isles of Farr unto the 61 degree Northward, whence the Duke of Medina, with his best stored ships tooke Westward over the maine Ocean towards Biscay, and so arrived safely in Spaine, where for his Welcome, hee was deposed from all his authority, forbidden to come at the Court, and commanded to bee private. Neither could hee thus give satisfaction for his bad successes, albeit hee imputed it to the treachery of his Mariners, their ignorance, and small experience of those Northerne Seas, the want of succours from the Prince of Parma, the tempest, shipwrackes, and all fortune, but not a word of the judgements of God upon this Gyantlike attempt to enslave all England to the mountaines of Granada or to the mines of Peru.

John Serres hist. France.

The successe of some ships on the Irish coasts.

(224) The residue of his shippes, about forty in number, fell neerer with the coast of Ireland, intending for Cape Clare, where they well hoped to water, but the winds contrary, and tempests storming upon those dangerous Seas, many of their shippes perished upon the shoares of Ireland, and among other a Great Galliasse, wherein Michael de Oquendo was a Commander, and two other of Venice, both ships of great burthen, besides thirty eight more, together with most of the Spaniards conteined within them. Those that got cleare of the dagger, put forth to Sea, whereof some with a strong West winde were driven into the channell of England where part of them were taken by the English, others by men of Rochel in France, and some arrived at Newhaven in Normandy. In so much, that of one hundred thirty foure shippes, which had set saileout of Lisbon, onely fifty three returned to Spaine: of the foure Galliasses of Naples, but one: of the foure Gallies of Portugall, but one: and of the ninety one Gallions, and great Hulkes from divers Provinces, onely thirty three returned, fifty eight being lost: in briefe, there were missing of their whole fleet, fourescore, and one vessels, and of the thirty thousand souldiers, thirteene thousand, five hundred, and odde. Of prisoners taken in England, Ireland, and the Low Countries were two thousand, and more. In England, Don Pedro de Valdez, Don Vasquez de Sylva, and Don Alonzo de Seyes; and others were kept for their ransome: in Zeland, Don Diego de Pimentell, and in Ireland, Don Alonzo de Lucon, Roderigo de Lasse and others of great account: to conclude, there was no famous or worthy family in all Spaine, which in this expedition lost not a sonne, a brother, or a kinsman.

(225) Thus were these Sea-services effected: as for the Land, preparations were made throughout the Kingdome, but the main forces lying encamped at Tilbury under the command of the Earle of Leicester, thither her Majesty in person upon the ninth of August repaired, full of Princely resolution, and more then feminine courage, whose lovely presence and imperiall speeches, as thee passed like some Amazonian Empresse through all her Army, were so acceptable, and gratious, that Her soldiers, full fraught with manly spirit, yet received an accesse of hardnesse from so alacrious a patterne in their Maiden Queene: and they perceived so well the love of their Prince, and thee saw what it was to have the love of her subjects, that the harmony of both their affections was admirable, both of them professing resolution, and willing to sacrifice their lives in that most rightfull quarrell. But the God of Hosts having now prevented their forwardnesse, without losse of English bloud, eft-soones the Campe was dissolved: and not long after Leicester ended his daies, having been a Peere of great estate, but lyable to the common destiny of most Great ones, whom all men magnifie in their life time, but few speake well of after their death.

Earle of Leicesters death.

(226) The Land thus delivered by the arme of the Omnipotent, and the Bore put backe that sought to lay Englands fayre vine-yeard waste, Queene Elizabeth (who ever held ingratitude a Capitall sinne, but especially towards her Almighty protectour) commanded solemne thankes-giving to bee celebrated unto the Lord God of Hosts, at the Cathedrall Church of Saint Pauls in her chiefe City of London, which accordingly was done upon Sunday the eight of September, where eleven of the Spanish Ensignes (the once badges of their bravery, but now of their vanity) were hung upon the lower battlements of that Church, as palmes of praise for Englands deliverance; a shew no doubt more acceptable to God, then when their spread colours did set out the pride of their shippes, threatning the bloud of so many innocent, and faithfull Christians.

Queene Elizabeths thankfullnesse to God.

(227) The next day, the Faire being kept in Southwarke, these faire flagges were spread upon London-Bridge to the great joy of the beholders, and eternall memory of Spanish purposes, as irreligious as unprosperous. But the solemne day assigned to be kept holy throughout the land, was the nineteenth of November, being Tuesday, which accordingly was then done, and would to God had so continued still, being no lesse for our deliverance, then was that Purim for the Iewes, which they instituted to be kept holy throughout their generations.

Esther. 9. 26.

(228) Queene Elizabeth therefore, to bee her selfe an example unto others, upon the Sunday following, being the foure, and twentieth of November, repayred from the Pallace of White-Hall in Westminster, through the streets of London in great Estate: and came accompanied with her Nobility unto the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paul, where dismounting from her Chariot at the West-doore, shee humbled her selfe upon her knees, and with great devotion, audibly praised God, acknowledging him her onely Defender, who had thus delivered the land from the rage of the enemy. And after the Sermon ended, wherein none other Argument was handled, but onely of prayse, and glory to bee rendred rendred unto God, her Majesty her selfe with most princely, and Christian speeches exhorted all the people to their due performance of those religious services of thankefulnesse unto God, like unto another Iosuah, David, and Iosias. The Zelanders also to leave a Memoriall of their no lesse gratitude to God, then faithfulnesse to the Queene, caused a new Coyne of silver to bee stamped, having on the one side the Armes of their Country engraven, with this inscription, Glory to God alone, and on the other side, the portraicts of great ships, under stiled, The Spanish Fleet, and in the circumference, It came, went, and was, Anno 1588, Wherein they alluded to that quicke worke of Cæsar, * Veni, vidi, vici, which wee have sene also excellently described in devise, whereon the one side, the Spanish Fleet had inscribed veni, the Sunne(the eye of the whole world) vidi, and the English Navy, vici, In other coines also were stamped ships fleeting, & sinking, and in the reverse, Supplicants upon their knees, with this Motto, Man proposeth, God disposeth, 1588. To the like effect also the Hollanders stamped the remembrance of this Armada in their monies, after the example of the Ancient, whose use was to inscribe their victories upon their Coines, of which kind were those with Spanish shippes, having this Word, Impius fugit nemine sequente.

The Zelanders thankfulnes to God.

* I came, I saw, I conquered.

(229) Neither did the Dutch alone participate the triumph of this glorious successe, but all other Nations also congratulated the same; which universall joy being excellently expressed in this ensuing Ode, by a * Stranger of eminent Piety, and Learning, and translated into all the chiefe Languages of Christendome; we will here annex the same, as the Close, and Epilogue of this Tragico-Comedy, to bee perpetuated unto all ensuing posterities.

(230) The Thunderclappe of this Spanish Armado thus past, and the invincible vanquished, as the attempt, and Issue was open to the eyes of the world, so the due consideration thereof was rooted in all true English hearts; whereupon the Nobles, and Comminalty being then assembled for Parliament, this course was at length thought fitteſt, that the proud Castilian should bee requited upon his owne coasts. And first it was determined to aide Don Antonio the expulsed King of Portugall, whose title was apparantly farre more just, then either Philips for England or Stukeleys for Ireland; both which Kingdomes they had in hostile manner invaded: and this the rather was resolved on, for that the Spanish King was endevouring to repaire his dishonour by repairing his Fleete, and Forces for a new expedition against England.

Consultations for attempts on Spaine.

Don Antonio King of Portugall flyeth to Queene Elizabeths protection.

(231) This Don Antonio among other Competitors claimed the Crowne of Portugall after the decease of King Henry, as sprung from King Emanuel by his sonne Don Lewis the Infant; but alleaged by the Philippians to have been his Bastard. Against which accusation Don Antonio had sentence for his legitimation by the Bishoppe of Angra, and every way sought to rubbe off that scandalous imputation. His conditions were such as well besitted a Crowne, hee being a Prince of greater spirit then person, and yet of rare modesty, and humility, seasoned with a dispositionvery devout, and religious, whereby hee came to bee in farre better favour, and esteeme then Philip of Spaine; for which cause hee was first made Defender of the Realme by the Governours, and afterwards accepted King by the people, whereto he was in a manner enforced, seeing himselfe environed with many drawne swords in midst of a furious multitude.

Philip prepareth for a new expedition.

His conditions.

(232) But Philip as more ambitious, so more strong in men, and munition, made warre into Portugall, and by his Generall, Duke Alba, put this new King unto flight; after which fortune, himselfe enters Portugall, where hee proclaimed eight hundred thousand Crownes to him that could bring him Don Antonio either alive or dead. But such was their love unto this unfortunate Prince, that eight moneths hee kept in Portugall disguised, and had conversation, and conference with many, yet was never betraied; but not able to hold up his side, the Governours (as is the fashion of the world) daily falling to his stronger, after many conflicts, and much lamenting their miserable estate, left the Spaniard (who then gaped for nothing but Kingdomes to possesse the Governement of Portugall.

Portugall poleſſed by the Spaniard.

(233) Antonio's kingly stile thus ended before it was throughly begunne; Philip had subjections offered him avid, and in such fort, as some that seemed Competitors, yeelded him their rights, among whom Katherina Dutchesse of Cragansa was one: yea and Pope Gregorie himselfe (with the Prior of Crato) who had hitherto sided with Don Antonio, knowing it was fureſt to hold with the strongeſt, sent Philip his Apostolicall allowance, the better to put on his New-gotten Crowne; exhorting him to thankfulneſſe, for theſe his prosperities; and moving him earnestly to make warre against England with proffers of assistance as wee have said.

(234) Don Antonio thus driven out of his Kingdome, for succour repaired unto the Court of France; where, of the Queene Mother, a pretended Competitor for the Portugall Crowne, hee was both favoured, and aided at Seas for the Isles of Terceres: but such was his destiny in his Sea-fights also, (the Peruan gold being no lesse powerfull then the Spanish Canons) that eight of the talleſt French Ships were lost, and two thousand men slaine; among whom was the Lord Philip Trosly the Generall, whose death was so Taken, and the expedition so censured, as the Portugal Captaines were reputed for Cowards, imprisoned in France, and many of them charged with corruption, and treason: so that all his hopes were now in the wane, and no further assistance could bee expected of the French.

(235) The poore Prince thus dejected in France, knowing the universall report of Queene Elizabeths great fame, obtained leave of her Majesty for access unto her sacred presence, whose Court had ever beene a famoused Sanctuary to all oppressed Princes, or distressed Estates: where shewing his right to the Portugall Crowne, and clearing the objections touching his Bastardy (which imputation in sundry languages hee refuted in Print to the publike view of the world) received now comfort to bee set in his kingdome Kingdome, England having so just an occasion to warre against Spaine. Among whom once more he assayed to try the favour of Fortune; his Petition to the Queene being onely this, that she would but land him safe in his Country, and amongst his owne People, of whose assured love and readinesse to receive him as their King, and thence-forward to defend him and his just Title, he nothing doubted. So honest and reasonable a suit could not but finde favour with so gracious a Queene: whereupon provision being made for the Portugall voyage, he embarked at Plimouth in April, whence sixe of the Queenes Ships, and twentie more of warre (besides many other ordained for transportation) spred their Sailes under the conduct of the ever-feared Sir Francis Drake, and the most valorous Sir John Norris Generall for the land service, with eleven thousand souldiers, and twentie five hundred Mariners. These * landing in a Bay of Galicia, neere unto the Groine, in their March were met and encountred within halfe a mile of the Towne, but their enemies were soone forced to retire unto their Gates.

An. Dom. 1589. The Portugall voyage.

*arth. wing faild, * April 20.

(236) The next day Generall Norris having viewed the advantage, resolved to attempt the place by a scalado, and to land some Artillery, to beat the Ships and Gallies which did play upon their troopes, which was effectually performed; and the Gallies forced to abandon the Roade, the Base-towne was surprized, and in three severall places entred, where the Inhabitants with a great cry tooke into the high Towne, but some prevented, escaping the fury of the sword, fled to the Rockes, where they were found and slaine to the number of five hundred. Among theſe fo hid, Don Iuan de Luna, a man of great command, was one, who the next morning came forth, and yeelded himselfe to the Generals devotion. Iuan de Vera, a Commissary of victuals was likewise taken, who confessed that there was in the Towne three hundred thousand Ducats of silver, and order given for the baking of three hundred thousand of Bisket, that the Towne was stored with two thousand Pipes of wine, a thousand Iars of Oyle, three thousand Kintals of Beefe, a great quantitie of Beanes, Peaſe, Wheat, and Fish, and of Match and Harquebuizes three Barkes were brought thither not long before. All which (hee confessed) were for a new voyage against England. And indeed such store of wines was there found, as the English Souldiers using little moderation in drinking, did not onely lay themselves open to danger from the upper Towne, but by distemperature so inflamed and infected their bloud, that it caused a great mortalitie and infection in the whole Army.

The Groine surprised. Infection through intemperate drinking of wine.

(237) The Base-Towne thus gotten, a fudden refcue of two thousand men so resolutely came to the very Gates, as though no contrary power could possibly keepe them from entrance, but in the first brunt of resistance, they were content to make their heeles the safe guardians of their heads, of whom yet many were cut short by the English purſuers. With the like feare the Shippes in the Road were fraught, whose Souldiers over-charging the great Ordonance of a great Gallion, abandoned her Board, and set her on fire, which for the space of two dayes burned in most terrible wise, so that of fiftie great peeces but sixteene were found whole, the reſt broken and melted, and so brought away by the English; but the higher towne strong both by scituation and sufficiency for resistance, resolutely held out, onely intreated by Parley to have faire Warres. And being built for the most part on a hard rocke, one place was found mineable, where the Generall the fourth day of this siege set men on worke, who bedded their powder somewhat too short of the wall, whereby that designe tooke not the suppoſed effect. But this error reduced, another as great was committed, for the Miners against set on worke, came right under the Wall, but somewhat wide of a great Tower thereupon built, so that when the blaſt of powder brake forth, it overthrew but a part of the same, and left the other standing tottering and shaken, which being not regarded, in the heat of assault fell suddenly upon the English, and slew Captaine Sydenham with thirtie Souldiers besides, to the great astonishment of the rest there imployed, not knowing the cause whereof it came; but rather suspecting it a Strategem of the Towne; and the rest of the rubbish lay so loose under foot, that the Assaulters could have no sure standing to make their fight.

The Enemy put to flight.

(238) Whiles these things were in doing, the Generall had certaine notice that the Conde de Andrada had assembled an Army of eight thousand strong, which was but the beginning of another more strong, levied under the Conde de Altemira; the former, not passing sixe miles off, and both of them intending the rescue of the Groine: To prevent which, Sir John Norris with nine Regimens * met them, and presently fell to a hot skirmish, whose brunt the enemy not able to endure, tooke over a bridge, built upon a Creeke of the Sea, at the further foot whereof their Campe lay very strongly entrenched. Sir Edward Norris, Colonell Sydney, the Captaines Hinder, Fulford, and Barton entred the bridge, whose further end was barricaded with barrels, where comming to push of pike and sword, Sir Edward was grievously hurt in the head, Captaine Hinder received five wounds in the head and face by the Sword; Captaine Fulford hurt in the left armе with a shot, and Captaine Barton hurt in the eye. Notwithstanding, the Generall so seconded the encounter, as the Guard was overthrowne, and the whole Army put into rout, of whom our men had the Chase fully three miles in foure fundry wayes. What the slaughter was, is uncertaine, but suppoſed to be great; besides others that were found hid in Vineyards and hedges, and two hundred put to sword that had taken into a Cloister. In this service the Kings Standard was taken, some plate and rich apparell found in their Campe, and the Country for three Miles compaſſe set on flaming fire; the Generall making his retreat with the Kings Colours and Armes displayed before him, to the great honour of the English.

The enemy encountred. * May 6.

The English are victors.

(239) Thus returning unto the Groine, and wanting Cannons to batter the walles, the English fired the base-Towne, embarked from thence, and put againe to Sea. But the windes being contrary, many affaies were made before the Fleet could recover the Burlings, in which paſſage Robert Earle of Eſſex, with M. Walter Deureux his brother, accompanied with others, * came to the Fleet; which Earle having put himselfe into the Iourney against the opinion of the world, or well-liking of the Queene, seemed unto the Sager fort to hazard his fortunes; but other more stirring spirits, held it the great advancement of his reputation; whereof I thinke I may say, as Tacitus said of Vespasians employment in Britaine, That there was laid the first foundation of his future esteeme.

(240) The Fleet thus encreased, they landed on Portugall, even under shot of the Castle of Peniche, where the Sea growing high, many were in perill of drowning; for most of them waded to the waſt for the Shoare. Of this Towne and peece, Conde de Fuentes had the command; who with five Companies of Spaniards fallied out against the English, and made their approach close to the Sea-side; whereupon the Earle of Essex, with Sir Roger Williams divided their men into two Troupes, the one keeping the Sands along the Shoare, and the other over the sand-hills made towards the in-land. Which the enemy seeing, hasted to the encounter, and came unto fight, even within push of Pike; but were so entertained, as they had no great liking, but presently turned their backs, and fled further then the English had reason to follow. The Towne they left undefended, of that it was entred without any resistance, resistance, and the Castle summoned the same night; the Captaine whereof was Antonio de Aurid, a Portugall, who demanding, and being satisfied, that Don Antonio was present, gave up the peece, with the munition therein. Vnto this place some Friers and other poore of the Country, came to welcome their King, promising him (in the name of the rest) a sufficient supply both of Horse and Foot, which notwithstanding was never performed.

The attempt for Lisbon.

(241) Here it was thought fit that the wounded and sicke should remaine, with sufficient provision, and seven Companies of Foot to guard the ships and Castle; and the maine Army to march over land unto Lisbon, the Metropolitane of Portugall, accounted the strongest Fort in the World, and whosoever held that, might (in their esteeme) make head against the mightiest Monarch in the Earth; whither likewise Sir Francis Drake (Generall of the Sea-service) promised to come, if the injury of weather did not hinder him. The March undertaken, Tarres Vedras made some shew of resistance, but presently upon the approch of the English, that Castle was abandoned, and left to the possession of Don Antonio; whose hopes hereupon began to enlarge, thinking the whole would stand for his claime; but therein was not a little deceived; for victuals growing scarse in the Army, the Country did not supply them according to expectation, neither came in any of strength. Notwithstanding the English Army from Vedras marched to San Sebastian, thence to Lores, and lodged the fift day at Alvelana, three miles from Lisbon, where many of their Souldiers perished by drinking in two places of poysoned standing waters, as also in eating of honey, purposely left in the houses, and spiced with poyson, as it was thought.

Spanish history.

The English approach Lisbon.

(242) The five and twentieth of May, the English Army came unto Lisbon, whose Suburbes were found abandoned, houses of provision for corne and victuals fired, and none left to defend but a form of old folkes and beggars, crying in the streets, Viva el Rey Don Antonio and about midnight they within the Towne set fire on their houses that stood within upon the wall. The English wearied with the six daies march, want of victuall, the last nights watch and many of them weake, were desirous of rest; where the enemy having advertisment, in the dead of the night sallied out of the Towne; and made their assault in three severall streets, but chiefly upon Colonell Brets Quarters, who being at rest (as most of the Army were) with what hast was possible, put himselfe, and his in Armes, and so throughly made head, that he was slaine in the place, Captaine Carre with the like resistance and valour ended his life; Captaine Carfey wounded to Death; Captaine Cave hurt, but not mortally. The others found not their attempts so easie, but were put to a suddaine and foule retreat; insomuch as the Earle of Essex (full of high spirit, and not youthly bloud) had them in chase to the very gates of the high towne and (as it was truly reported) the enemies losse did triple the English, aswell in quantitie, as in men of qualitie.

A Sally on the English.

Essex pursueth the enemy to the very Gates.

(243) Meane while Generall Drake with his whole Fleet was come to Cascais, and possessed the towne without any resistance, for the inhabitants at the discovery of his Navie, fled with bagge and baggage into the mountaines, which the Generall perceiving, sent unto them a Portugall Pilote, to offer them all peaceable kindnesse, so as they would accept of their rightfull King, and minister necessaries to the Army which he had brought. Which offer they joyfully embraced, and presently sent two chiefe men of the Towne, to signifie their loyaltie to Don Antonio, and their honest affection to his Army, whereupon Sir Francis immediately landed his Companies, but not without perill of the Castle, which being guarded by the Spaniards, held out against him for their King.

Drake inpossesseth Cascais.

(244) At Lisbon the Portugals had promised to aid Antonio, with three thousand horse, besides other supplies from the Duke of Braganza, Don Francisco de Toledo, and others, at a day perfixed, and now altogether past, by reason (as it seemeth) that the Spaniards having chiefe command in all places, they were unable by any meanes to make head. Whereupon the unfortunate Antonio seeing the time expired, and but fortie Horse come, nor of foot sufficient to furnish two Enfignes, grew almost hopelesse, yet assayed he to perswade a stay before Lisbon for nine dayes more: but the Towne being strong, and the English declining (for there was the first apparant shew of sicknesse among them) the Portugals backward, and of base resolutions, ready to obey any so themselves may be rich: and the Generall having already done more then was promised, lest they should hazard the honour which hitherto had beene got, denied his request, and gave present order to returne to Cascais, himselfe, the Earle of Essex, and Sir Roger Williams remaining with the stand, that was made in the high street, till the whole Army was drawne into the field: at which time, the King (even herein of kingly disposition towards his Natives) made request to save the suburbes from spoile; which if the English had ransacked, they had beene the richest Army that ever returned to England. But now ready to depart Lisbon, the noble Essex in the courage of his Martiall bloud, ranne his Speare and brake it against the Gates of that City: demanding aloud, if any Spaniard mewed therein, durst adventure forth in favour of his Mistresse to breake a staffe with him. But those Gallants thought it safer to court their Ladies with amorous discourses; then to have their loves written on their breasts with the point of his English Speare.

Don Antonio his Princely compassion.

(244) Being now come to Cascais, intelligence was brought by a Frier, that the enemy was marched unto Saint Iulina with a strong power to encounter the English, unto whose Generall, the Generall Norris sent a Trumpet, promising to meete him the next morning if hee durst abide his comming, and withall gave him the lie: the Earle of Essex also sent him a particular Cartell, offering himselfe against any of theirs, if they had any of his qualitie, or else sixe, eight, or tenne, to trie single combate, whereat this Spaniards combe was so cut, as in the night, before battell, in great feare and perturbation he dislodged, and returned to Lisbon, not answering the Challenge, but threatning to hang the Messenger, who followed him even to the very Gate. Then was the Castle of Cascais rendred upon condition, that the men of Armes should depart with bagge and baggage; which peece in part, by the Order of the Generall, was blowne up by mine. During which time threescore Hulkes laden with Corne, Masts, Cables, Coppes, and Waxe, being the Spanish Kings provision were taken going to Lisbon.

The Castle of Cascais rendred.

Sixty Spanish Hulkes taken.

(245) The English having thus farre proceeded, put againe to Sea, when, unlooked for, and in a great calme, nine Gallies fell in the winde of their Fleet, and so plaid upon a straggling Barke of Plimouth, that Captaine Calverly, his Lieutenant, the Master, and some of the Mariners, abandoning the vessell, betooke them to their Boates, whereof one, (in which the Captaine and Master were) was over-runne by the Gallies, and they both drowned. Two other Hulkes also stragling from the Fleet, were set upon by the Spaniards; in one of which, Captaine Minsham fought to the last, and very valiantly after his ship was on fire; but whether fired by himselfe or the enemy, could not be judged; the calme being so still, as no succour could be sent from the Fleet, to their great griefe.

(246) Thus continuing seventeene dayes on board, many of the dead souldiers were cast into the Sea; and the whole now consisted of two thousand men, who comming to Vigo, found every street fenced with a strong Barricadoe, and but only one man in the Towne; the Inhabitants making toward Bayon

as fast as they could drive; then was both the Towne and all the Countrey for seven miles compasse set on a flame. Which fervice thus performed, Sir Francis Drake with the Queenes Ships safely * arrived at Plymouth, and upon the second of July following, arrived Sir Iohn Norris, having both of them performed the parts of worthy Generals.

The English arrived at Plymouth. *Iune 21.

John Speed. The State of France.

(248) Whilest these Realmes were at variance each against other, the French were not quiet among themselves, the King somewhat voluptuous, but excessively prodigall towards his favourites; the Nobilitie ambitious, misstruthfull, and disloyall, the Clergy turbulent, and undutifull, bending all their force and thoughts against the Plantation of the Truth. To unite friendship therefore, some league had beene made, for confirmation whereof, the three Estates were assembled at Bloys. For the Clergy appeared one hundred thirty foure Deputies, among whom were foure Arch-bishops, one and twentie Bishops, and two Generals of Orders: for the Nobilitie came one hundred and fourescore Gentlemen, and for the third Estate an hundred fourescore and eleven Deputies, all of them Lawyers and Merchants. Vpon the first sitting, and before these best wits of France, King * Henry made a solemne Oration to perswade union, full of lively affection, true magnanimity, and pregnant reasons, delivered with such an admirable eloquence and grace, as it ravished the eares of all present, besides the opening of the propositions; the which, Mantelon, the keeper of the Seale, for him further prosecuted: after him, Reynauld de Beaulme, Archbishop of Bourges, Patriarke, and Primate of Aquitaine, spake in the same argument: and lastly, Michaell Marteau, Provost and President for the third Estate, confirmed, and consented to all that had beene said. Whereupon an Oath of union was taken, to binde the King, them, and all their Posterities, the fundamentall Lawes and liberties of France onely reserved.

* Henry 3.

An oath of Vnion in France.

(249) This notwithstanding, the Leaguers, to hit the marke whereat they aymed, daily divulged and buzzed the French Kings disgraces, and all to install the Guize in his Throne; the Papists wrongs were grievously expostulated, their Churches burnt, and Altars prophaned, the People oppressed with impositions and Subsidies; Places of Iudgement set to sale, and spirituall Benefices to him that would give most: the Offices at Court, they alledged, were managed by men of meane ranke; the Noblemens services neglected, and unrewarded. All these, and more, were complained of, and all to make the King base in the Peoples eye, the Guize himselfe the while temporizing with both, as diswading the King to subject his authoritie unto their complaints, and at the same present perswading the other, to be vehement in their pursuits.

The Guizians practises.

An. Dom. 1588. Novem. 4.

(250) Among their other practises, one was against the King of Navarre; whom the Clergy condemned for an Heretike, the chiefe (as they termed him) of the relapse; excommunicated and deprived him of the Government of Guienne, and of all other dignities, as being unworthy of successions of Crownes or Realmes. But Henry, with Festus thought it unreasonable, to condemne this Prince without hearing, and therefore desired to have him againe summoned, and againe to be sworne to the Vnion.

Acts 25.

(251) To this motion was answered, that the Cardinall of Bourbon his Vncle had once obtained absolution for him; that the Queene Mother had many times assayed to winne him, many learned Doctors had beene sent to reclaime him: but all in vaine. For, from the Cradle (said they) he hath beene brought up in this new Heresie, hath beene condemned by the Councell of Trent, received againe into grace by the Consistory, is againe fallen into the error which he abjured, and is now an Heretike, relapsed, unworthy of obedience, stnworthy of respect, and unworthy to be prayed for: for the holy See of Rome hath declared him a Schismatike, excommunicated him as uncapable of succession, and therefore must the Estates of France ratifie the Popes sentence; and King Henry must thereunto subscribe, if not, the Duke of Guize, who was Master of the Castle, and carried the keyes at his owne girdle, would dissolve the Assembly, and lay all the blame upon his Majestie.

Henry King of Navarre pronounced uncapable of the Crowne of France.

(252) Thus then (by the purpose of man) the first Prince of the bloud, and the onely remainder, after so many sisters and cousens of Anjou, Alencon, Eureux, Berry, Bourgeyne, Angoulesme, and Orleans, and which onely succeeded that of Valois, was now deprived of the succession which Nature gave him, without calling, or hearing of his justifications.

(253) To further this Guizian enterprize, his followers buzd into the heads of the multitude, that it was the Kings Climactericall yeare, and so many presumptions were observed, as it was told the King in plaine termes, that the Duke of Guize would surprize him. Whereupon, hauing remained long in suspence, betwixt the rigour of revenge, and the mildnesse of his owne disposition; at last, by the lightening, supposing a thunder-clap would follow, he sought timely to prevent the danger, by taking away his life, that intended the blow. Which was not so secretely carryed, but that the designe was discovered, and a scrowle laid under Guize his Napkin as he sate at dinner, wherein it was written, that his life was in danger: but hee, as one confident in his owne power, wrote in the same scrowle these words, they dare not; and threw it from him under the Table. Other advertisements he had, (if we may beleeve the additions of Serres) from Rome, Spaine, Lorraine, and Savoy, that a bloudy Catastrophe should dissolve this Assembly, their Almanacks had observed it, and it was generally predicted for Saint Thomas day.

(254) But the Duke bearing himselfe bold upon his owne greatnesse, neglected all motives, and very presumptuously spake to the King, complaining that the affaires of France inclined from bad unto worse, uncurable, and almost growne desperate, wherefore, the charge he had received, he would againe give up, and retire into the Countrey, lest other mens sinnes should be imputed his.

(255) The King, who had resolved on his death, gave him good words, with promise of amendment what in him lay, and held him with familiar discourses, and favourable countenance, untill a fit time should be offered; which was the three and twentieth of December, when the Lords sitting in Councell, and entring consultation, the Guize was called for unto the King, who as he lifted up the Tapestry into his Cabinet, was charged upon by the Guard, and with their Swords and Partizans presently slaine; the King avouching, that thence-forth hee would rule alone. And not long after, the Cardinall of Guize, brother to the Duke, dranke of the same Cup, at the commandement of the King.

John Speed.

(256) This death of the Guize and Cardinall, caused the King to be exceedingly hated of the Papals, whose Preachers branded his reproaches in their Pulpits, incensing the People to open rebellion, and as Furies of Hell heaped an Iliad of curses upon the heads of the Executioners. In Paris the Kings furniture, and in the Lowre his Pictures were broken, his Armes beaten downe, his Images dragged through the streets, his great Seale defaced, and his royall name blurred with many opprobrious termes. Yea, and the Colledge of Sorbon as forward as any, concluded by a publike * Act, That the people of France were free from the Oath of Obedience and Fealty, which they stood ingaged in unto Henry of Valois, that lawfully, and with a good conscience they might arme themselves against him, receive his revenues, and imploy it in their warres for his overthrow.

* Dated Ian. 7.

able exploits in Hungary against the Turkes, as Iarnac against the Protestants, at Poitiers, at Montcontour, at Vimorry, and at other places; in a word, such were the intestine troubles of France, as the King sent for Henry King of Navarre, to helpe quench the flames of civill sedition, which were mounted so high, as that the Leaguers prevailed against the Lords of Parliament, prophaned Churches, violated Virgins, and defiled their Christian profession with streames of bloud. And to fill up the measure of their impious iniquity, a Iacobin Frier, by name Iames Clement, when the King had besieged Paris, (the head City of this rebellion) made vowes to kill the Tyrant (as he termed him) to free that holy City from Senacheribs siege; with which resolution he went to Doctor Bourgoine, Prior of his Covent, and imparted this damnable project to him, to Father Commolet, to other Iesuites, and to the heads of the League, all of them incouraging him to this Divelliſh deſigne, with promiſe of Abbeyes and Biſhoprickes, if he eſcap'd, and if he dyed in the action, to be made a Martyr, and have place in Heaven above the Apoſtles.

A Iacobine Frier undertaketh to kill the King.

An. Dom. 1589.

(258) Thus furniſhed with bleſſings for this curſed act, upon the firſt of Auguſt the Monke went to Paris, and had private acceſſe to the King to deliver a Letter, pretending ſome matter of importance; but as the King read it, the Diabolicall Inſtrument with a Knife from his ſleeve, wounded him in the bottome of his belly, and there left the knife, which the King drew forth, and with the ſame ſtrucke this Iacobine above the eye: their ſtrugling being heard, many haſtily came in, who ſeeing the King wounded, and all in goare bloud, in their rage ſtabbed the Monſter to death, and not many dayes after, King Henry dyed of the wound.

(259) Whereupon Charles Cardinall of Bourbon, a younger brother to Anthony King of Navarre, and Vncle unto Henry then the preſent King, was proclaimed Lieutenant Governour, yea, and gold and ſilver coyned with his picture and ſtile of Charles the tenth, King of France. Howbeit, Henry King of Navarre was proclaimed of the Army, whoſe right was before the Papall Prelates, and whom the laſt Henry by his laſt will ordained to be his Succeſſor. Notwithſtanding onely in reſpect of his Religion, being a profeſſed Proteſtant, the Leaguers made ſuch head againſt him, that hee was enforced to ſue unto that Generall Sanctuary of Princes, Queene Elizabeth for her aide, who ever favouring the progreſſe of the Goſpell, and knowing Navarres claime to be above all other (of that Nation) for the French Crowne, and that the Spaniard was ſetting foot into France: firſt, ſent him twenty thouſand pound ſterling, with Powder, Munition for warre, and certaine ſhips alſo to ſerve at his command; and cauſing a generall muſter to be taken in moſt of the Shires in England, ſent foure thouſand Souldiers furniſhed, from every of them into France; to which ſervice the Citizens of London ſet forth a thouſand very well appointed, and ſerviceable men: the Generall of all which Forces, was the noble Peregrine Bertu Lord Willoughby: whoſe want ſhe againe ſupplyed with three thouſand foot, which were ſent into Britaine, under the conduction of Sir John Norris, that ſonne of Mars: theſe joyning with the Prince Dombes, Lord Generall of that Province, performed many worthy exploits for the French King.

(260) But Parma being entred France, and the * Pope with the Cardinals fulminating his Excommunication againſt Henry, and his adherents: Queene Elizabeth (who never was daunted with ſuch flaſhes) ſent into France Robert Earle of Eſſex, for her Lieutenant Generall over foure thouſand Footmen, and two hundred Horſe, (beſides many Pyoners) all of them to bandy for the King againſt his enemies the Leaguers. The Earle, though young, yet full of valour, was followed with many voluntary Gentlemen, whoſe countenances well ſhewed the courage of their hearts: Theſe landing in Normandy, laid ſiege unto the ſtrong Roan, in aſſault whereof his brother Walter Deureux was ſlaine with a ſmall ſhot, to the exceſſive griefe of the Earle, and others, being a Gentleman trained up, both by Academicall and Martiall education, unto very great hopes and expectation.

(261) But King Henry finding many rubs in his way, the Leaguers ſtill increaſing their ſtrengths from Rome, and Spaine, and the Crowne of France laid at ſtake for him that threw moſt, thought it good policy (though proved to him in the end diſaſterous and fatall) to temporize with the predominating faction; and therefore leaving the Religion wherein he had beene bred, fell to that of Rome, which ever till then he had reſiſted, and after great ſuite made to the Pope, was laſtly abſolved by the Holy Father, who heaped whole ſtreames of bleſſings upon his ſacred head, himſelfe ſwearing to defend the Romiſh faith againſt all impugners: ſo that now all ſides ſatisfied, without contradiction; Henry of Navarre was crowned King of France. Onely the Spaniards were unwilling to leave that faire Countrey, fortified in Britaine upon the River, over againſt Breſt; whence after much ſlaughter, Generall Norris forced them, though with the loſſe of ſome Engliſh, and life of Captaine Furbiſher, Commander of the Fleet.

An. Dom. 1593. July 25.

(262) The Leaguers not liking Navarres advancement, miſtruſting that his converſion was fained, and temporary, as being but a ſtep, the eaſier to mount the Royall Throne: by treaſon laid waite for his life, and croſt what they could his countenance at Rome; whileſt the Spaniards imployed all their wits for the worrying of France, and ſo farre perſiſted in their deſignes, as King Henry by Proclamation denounced warre againſt Spaine, and Philip in like manner proclaimes warre againſt France; in which ſtate they ſtood, during the life of Erneſtus Archduke of Auſtria, brother in Law, and Nephew unto King Philip, whoſe Governour hee then was in the Low-Countries.

Warres proclaimed betwixt France and Spaine.

(263) After whom ſucceeded his brother Albertus the Military Cardinall, and Arch-duke of Auſtria, who no ſooner was made Governour in place of his Brother, but that hee prepared againſt the French and United Eſtates: and to make his aſſayes, he firſt began with Callis, a thing long before projected by others in his place; that Towne being a Sea-port of great importance, as the Engliſh found it whileſt it was theirs, and the loſſe thereof great, as Queene Mary and her wiſe Statiſts both tooke it, and felt it.

Callis ſurpriſed.

(264) At this time the Garriſon was ſmall, and the Governour negligent, undiſcreet, and unfortunate, though having notice from Netherland, that the Spaniard meant her ſiege; ſo that Ricebanke left unmanned, and in great ruine, was entred upon by the Cardinall, and ſuch as reſiſted, driven into the Towne; where, with the Inhabitants he grew to a compoſition for the ſurrender, Pyſdoſſein the Governour never interpoſing therein.

An. Dom. 1596.

(265) Callis thus turning Spaniſh, and the Spaniards ſtill intending for England, Elizabeth ſollicited the French King, and proffered her aide for recovery of that Peece; but he empoveriſhed by warre, ſought to re-gaine his loſſes rather by ſome faire conditions of peace, then to depend upon the dependancies and hazard of Armies: at which reſolution, our Noble Zenobia was nothing well pleaſed, and therefore to prevent the practiſes of Spaine, began to make good againſt them, and prepared another expedition to Sea. But dealing more Prince-like then Philip had done by her (who made faireſt pretence of peace, when he was hoteſt in preparing warre) ſhee cauſed to be publiſhed and Printed a Declaration of the juſt cauſes moving her to ſet forth her Navy, for the defence of her Realme, the Tenor whereof we thinke not unfit to be here inſerted.

Queene Elizabeth ſollicited by the French King, and proffereth aide to recover Callis.

And becauſe Her Majeſty hath good intelligence of perfect amity with all Kings and Princes of Chriſtendome, ſaving with the King of* Spaine, who hath this many yeeres moſt unjuſtly profeſſed openly great enmity by divers actions, both againſt Her royall Perſon, and Her People, and Countries, without any juſt cauſe firſt given on Her Majeſties part: Therefore we the ſaid Earle, and Lord Admirall, doe aſſertaine all perſons, that we are moſt ſtraitly commanded by Her Excellent Majeſty, to forbeare from offending in this our voyage of any manner of Perſons of what Nation ſoever, except the ſaid Kings Naturall Subjects, or ſuch other borne Strangers, as ſhall give to the ſaid King manifeſt ayde with Men, Shippes, Artillery, Victuall, and other warlike proviſions for invaſion of Her Majeſty. Which Her Majeſties commandement wee meane dutifully to obſerve, and doe therefore give ſtraite charge to all perſons, that ſhall ſerve in this Navy underneath us, upon paine of extreame puniſhment to obſerve the ſame; yet to avoyde all occaſions that may breede queſtion, who they are, being not the King of Spaines Subjects, that ſhall be charged by us, to bee manifeſt ayders for the furniſhing and ſtrengthning of the ſaid Kings Forces, provided either by Land or Sea, to attempt any invaſion of Her Majeſties Countries: Wee doe for the liquidation of this doubt, earneſtly in Gods name, require and charge all perſons, that are not the ſaid Kings Naturall Subjects, and yet that have given him ayde with their ſhippes, victuall and munition as is above ſaid, to withdraw all their ſaid ſhips prepared for the warre, and all their proviſions of hoſtility out of any Havens of Spaine or Portugall, or from the company and ſervice of the Kings ſhips againſt our Navy; and therewith to returne either to their owne Countries, or if they ſhall like to come to our Navy, to whom, in the reverend name of Our Soveraigne Lady the Queenes Majeſty, Wee doe promiſe all Security, both for their perſons and goods, to be uſed and defended as friends and to ſuffer all their Shippes and proviſions, that were taken by the King of Spaine, or intended for his ſervice, or that ſhall be by the Owners withdrawne from his ayde, to remaine in their free diſpoſitions, ſo as the ſame be uſed in all ſorts as friends, and not as enemies to the Queenes Majeſty, and to us her Generals: and if any ſhall upon knowledge of this Her Majeſties moſt honourable Order, and of our promiſe (to obſerve the ſame as favourably as Wee may) willingly and manifeſtly refuſe to accept this our offer, and ſhall not endeavour themſelves to performe this reaſonable requeſt, tending to their good and liberty; Wee ſhall then bee juſtly moved, as by the law of Armes Wee may, to take and uſe all ſuch ſo refuſing this our offer, as manifeſt ayders of the King of Spaine with forces to invade Her Majeſties Dominions, and ſo manifeſt enemies: and in ſuch caſe of that refuſall, if any harme ſhall happne by any attempt againſt their Perſons, Shippes and goods, by any our Navy, for the ayding of the ſaid King, there ſhall bee no juſt cauſe for them hereafter to complaine, or to procure their Naturall Princes and Lords to ſollicite reſtitutions or amends for the ſame. And for the more notification hereof, Wee have thought good to have the Originall hereof to bee ſigned with our hands, and with our Seales, to bee ſent by any that will require the ſame in Print, in French, Italian, Dutch and Spaniſh, and have alſo cauſed the ſame to bee diſtributed into as many Ports of Spaine and Portugall as conveniently might bee, for the better knowledge to bee had in the ſaid Ports, as alſo in all other Ports under his ſubjection.

2 King. 19. 15.

Moſt omnipotent Maker, and Guider of the Worlds Maſſe, that onely ſearcheſt and fadomeſt the bottome of our hearts conceits, and in them ſeeſt the true Originals of all our actions intended: thou that by thy foreſight doeſt truely diſcerne, how no malice of revenge, nor quittance of injury, nor deſire of bloud-ſhed, nor greedineſſe of lucre, hath bred the reſolution of our now-ſet out Army, but a heedfull care and wary watch, that no neglect of foes, nor over-ſurety of Haven, might breed either danger to us, or glory to them: thoſe being the grounds wherewith thou doeſt inſpire the minde; wee humbly beſeech thee with bended knees, proſper the worke, and with beſt fore-winds guide the journey, ſpeed the victory, and make the returne the advancement of thy glory, the triumph of their ſame, and ſurety to the Realme; with the leaſt loſſe of the Engliſh bloud. To theſe devout Petitions, Lord give thou thy bleſſed grant.

The voyage to Cadiz.

(270) Thus ready for Seas, upon the firſt of Iune a warning Peece being ſhot off, all weighed Anchors, and with a gallant ſhew, and full ſailes followed the Lord Admirall; but the wind ſcanting before they paſt Cornwall, they were enforced backe into the Sound, where ſtaying two dayes, upon the third, the winde came about, and with a proſperous Gale brought them to Cape Saint Vincent, where an Iriſh Barke was met with from Cadiz, which ſignified the ſtrength of the Towne, and the ſhipping that lay in the Bay, to wit, twenty Gallies, ninety Sailes of Ships, whereof five were of thoſe great Gallions, which are called the Kings twelve Apoſtles, (all doubtleſſe the ſonnes of Thunder) two great Galliaſſes, three Frigats, three Argoſies, twenty Biſkaines; the reſt were Merchants ſhips, rich and of great burden, whoſe ladings were munition, coyne, oyle, wine, waxe, ſilke, cloth of gold, and quickeſilver; ſome bound for the Indians, ſome for Britaine, ſome for Lisbon, and ſome for other places. Newes moſt acceptable unto the Generals, who haſting thitherwards, upon Sunday the twentieth of Iune, aſſayed at the Friery of Saint Sebaſtian, on the weſt ſide of Cadiz to land their men, but the place ſtrong, and the Seas going high, their purpoſe was hindered.

The rich ladings of the Spaniſh Ships.

(271) May I relate with hope of credite what others have reported upon their owne eye-ſight? At the firſt approach of this Royall Navy before Cadiz, a faire Dove (a fortunate Preſager) betimes in the morning, is ſaid to have lighted upon the Mayne-yard of the Lord Admirals ſhip, and there to have ſate quietly the ſpace of three howres, every man gazing, but no man ſuffered to harme Her: as alſo the laſt day of their departure thence, another Dove preſented her ſelfe in the ſame manner, and in the ſame ſhip, growing wonderfully tame and familiar with the men, and ſo continued with them till they came into England.

(272) The day following their approach, being the firſt of the weeke, the Spaniſh ſhips in the road in number fifty nine, attended with twenty Gallies by the adviſe of their * Admirall, ſhot with the tide within the point of Maine-land, unto Caſtle Puntall, and in the ſtraites of the Bay, ſorted themſelves in good order, and of a reaſonable diſtance, as well to offend the enemy, as to releeve each others interchangeably.

* Diego Soto.

(273) The Bay was narrow whereunto they had entred, full of Rockes, ſhelves, and ſands, all which notwithſtanding, it was in Councell determined, that the Lord Thomas Howard, Sir Walter Rawleigh, Sir Francis Vere, Sir George Carew, and Sir Robert Southwell, with ſome Londoners, and a Squadron of the Low-Countrey Ships ſhould begin the fight; which was moſt valiantly attempted, maintained, and continued, the thundring ſhot battering their bulkes, and renting their ſhrowdes.

(274) In the heate whereof, the Earle of Eſſex, (in Councell appointed to keepe the Maine Battell) upon the ſudden from Port Saint Maries ſide, thruſt himſelfe formoſt in this Sea-fight, which the other Generall perceiving, and the Arke-Royall too unweldy for that narrow water, tooke into his Pinnance, and forwarded the fight to the end: Meane while the Gallies were aſſayled by Sir John Wingfield, who with his ſmall ſhippes ſo hanſelled their ſides, as they were forced to creepe by the Shoare, and ſo got paſſage at the Bridge, contrary to the expectation of the Engliſh, whoſe eyes were ever ayming at the faireſt Marke, which indeed was the Philip, ſo battered with Bullets, that he began to ſtagger, and give over fight; whoſe Souldiers ſeeking to ſave themſelves by water, and ſwimming, ſet this Apoſtle (their Admirall) on fire, by whoſe example, the Saint Thomas, another of Spaines Apoſtles, did the like, leſt the Engliſh ſhould leade them in triumph of

(275) Theſe ſervices thus forwarded, the Earle of Eſſex forth-with landed his men under the Blockehouſe Puntall, about a mile Weſt-ward from Cadiz, whence it was thought expedient to ſend ſome Regiments to the Bridge, on the Weſt of the Iland, to impeach all ſuccours that ſhould come from the Maine: To which ſervice were ſent Sir Chriſtopher Blunt, Sir Thomas Gerrard, (now Lord Gerrard) and Sir Comers Clifford with a power of twelve hundred ſtrong. Meane-while the Generall Eſſex, with the Earle of Suſſex, Count Lodowicke, Lord Harbert, Lord Burk, Sir George Carew (now Lord Carew) and others tooke towards Cadiz.

The aſſault on Cadiz.

(276) The ſide of their entrance was fortified with a Wall through the necke of the Promontory from Sea to Sea, and a Counters-karpe raiſed ſome diſtance, where were built two Bulwarkes, and a Curtaine for the ſtronger defence of the Towne; the enemy having alſo an advantage from the higher aſcent, played fore upon the Engliſh to their great annoyance, inſomuch that the formoſt began to give backe from the Gate, which the Earle of Eſſex perceiving, to engage his Souldiers reſolutions, caught his owne Colours, and caſt them over the Wall into the Towne, giving withall a moſt hote aſſault unto the Gate, where to ſave the honour of their Enſigne, happy was hee that could firſt leape downe from the Wall, and with ſhot and Sword make way through the thickeſt preſſe of the enemy. The Towne thus ſurprized, the Lord Admirall haſted to ſecond the charge, when a hote encounter enſued: for the ſtreetes were very narrow, ſo as but two could march on breaſt, and from their flat rooſted Houſes, heapes of ſtones were tumbled downe, to the great hurt of many of the Engliſh, who nevertheleſſe drove the enemy before them into the Market place, where the worthy Sir John Wingfield, ſore wounded at the Gate in his thigh, was ſhot with a Musket from a loope-hole of the Caſtle into the head, and preſently dyed.

(277) But the Towne and Caſtle ſurrendred, a Proclamation was made to ſtay the fury of the Souldier, and the ſlaughter of the Spaniard, with commandement upon paine of death, that no man ſhould offer violence or harme to any religious perſon, woman, or child. And ſuch honourable care had the LL. Generals for the Inhabitants, that they ſent them in their owne Pinnaces unto Porto Sanctæ Maria; the Ladies and Gentlewomen firſt, who were ſuffered to depart in their coſtliеſt apparell, and richeſt Iewels: and to ſave them from the ſpoiles, or any the leaſt wrong of the ruder Souldiers or Seamen, the Generals themſelves in perſons ſtood at the water-ſides, to ſee them ſhipped without hurt or violence.

The Chriſtian uſage of the Engliſh towards the conquered.

(278) The rich Biſhop of Cuſco being taken Priſoner, without any ranſome was releaſed, and all other of ſacred Orders of Habite, ſuffered without touch to depart; ſuch was the heroicall Clemency of theſe moſt Noble and truely Engliſh Generals, to the great glory of our Nation, as the Spaniards themſelves were forced to confeſſe. The Towne thus wonne, the ſpoyle thereof was given to the Engliſh Captaines and Souldiers, the wearing clothes of the Inhabitants onely excepted, and the Citizens compounding with the Lords Generals, to pay an hundred and twenty thouſand Ducats for their ranſome, were ſuffered to depart: for payment whereof, forty of the chieſeſt Citizens, Cavalleroes, Clergy men, and Merchants, were brought pledges into England, till the money was paid.

by the offers they made; for no leſſe then two millions and a halfe of Ducats were offered by them for the redemption: but the LL. Generals more minding honour and the ſervice they came for, would heare of no compoſition but for the Merchants ſhips onely, which whileſt it was in traviſe to and fro, the Duke of Medina Sidonia, Admirall of Spaine, commanded them all together to be ſet on fire; which was ſuddenly done: and the flames terribly mounting, forced the pitchy ſmoake, as thicke clouds to darken the Aire. Among theſe were two of the Spaniſh Apoſtles, the Mathew and the Andrew; the firſt of which was ſaved by the Lord Admirals directions, and the ſecond was quenched by Sir Thomas Gerrard, in whoſe bottome himſelfe returned for England.

(280) Thus in an inſtant, a Fleet, full of men, Merchandize, victuall, armour, and twelve hundred peeces of Ordonance, all valued by themſelves, at twelue Millions of Ducats, was ſuddenly ſunke, conſumed or taken; the Towne alſo ranſacked, every Souldier bringing ſome portion of her rich ſpoiles into England, to ſhew the ſervice he performed at Cadiz. The Towne they burnt, ſaving the Churches only: the Walles they battered, and Towers demoliſhed, the Iland it they burned, razed and ſpoiled, laying all waſte before them, and leaving the rubbiſh to declare the ruines which the Engliſh had made.

Iune 30.

(281) Vpon the fifth of July the Earle of Eſſex with his, abandoned Cadiz, the Lord Admirall being gone or boord ſome five dayes before; and the next day the whole Fleet ſet ſaile Weſtward towards Faro a Towne in Algarva; where the Earle deſirous to doe ſome further exploit upon the terra firma of Spaine, landed his men (the Lord Admirall on board ſecuring the Seas) and marching to Faro, hee found it emptie of men, the Inhabitants being fled with much of their ſubſtance, and the Towne left deſtitute of victuall (yet in the Nunnery and in the Biſhops Palace, ſome goods were found, and in the Library Bookes valued at a thouſand Markes; and among other prizes of note, the faireſt Culverin the King of Spaine had; was there found, and ſeaſed upon; the Engliſh forrage the Countrey for three leagues about; and burnt the Towne Latha without any reſiſtance.

The attempt on the ſtrand.

(283) Thence the firſt of Auguſt the LL. Generals ſell before Groine, where ſeeing no ſhips ſtirring, and the Seas altogether cleared, upon the ſeventh of the ſame moneth they ſafely and very richly arrived at Plimouth, to the great honour of England, glory of their Queene, and renowne of their owne valours and famous adventures.

The Engliſh returne.

(283) But as the wrongs offered by the Spaniards, ſeemed to the Engliſh farre greater then was yet the revenge: ſo alſo the moſt prudent Queene held it ſtill fit to finde King Philip more worke at home, and therefore a third voyage was undertaken the yeare following, whereof Robert Earle of Eſſex was made as well Lord Generall for the Land, as Admirall for the Sea; having for the one ſervice, his Vice-Admirall the Lord Thomas Howard, Knight of the Order, and his Rere-Admirall, Sir Walter Rawleigh, Captaine of the Guard; for the other, his Lieutenant Generall was Sir Iohn Mountioy Knight of the Order; his Marſhall, Sir Francis Vere Coronell Generall of the Low-Country-Forces; Sir George Carew Lord Preſident of Munſter, Maſter of his Ordonance; and Sir Ferdinando Gorge, Sergeant Major of the field. The whole number conſiſted of five thouſand men, beſides Mariners, for which an hundred and twentie ſhips were furniſhed, whereof ſeventeene were her Majeſties, ſixtie men of Warre, the reſt for victuall and tranſportation. Theſe upon the ninth of July were embarked at Plimouth for the Ilands of Azores, and having cleared ſixtie Leagues, fell fowle by a Tempeſt, and were driven backe againe to Plimouth, and againe thence ſet ſaile upon the 17. of Auguſt next following.

(284) Vpon the fifteenth of September they fell with the Iſles Flores, Evernes, Fyall, and Pike; all which ſubmitted themſelves to the Lord Generals devotion; whence weying their Anchors, they made ſaile for Saint Michaels, and there before the Towne caſt them againe, where it was determined that Sir Walter Rawleigh ſhould keep the Sea, whiles the Lord Generall with two thouſand ſhould land elſe-where in the Iland; which they did, and ſacked the rich towne Villa Franca: but the Seas going high, and the Winter ſtormes approaching, after the ſpoile of thoſe places, the deſtruction of a Carracke richly laden with Sugars, fired by her owne men, the taking of a Braſile man, and the ſurprize of three prizes which they brought into England, valued at foure hundred thouſand Ducats, they returned, the Spaniard every where having the worſt.

Villa Franca ſacked.

(285) Theſe ſtirres on the Seas brought yet further miſchiefes on the Spaniard, by hindring the trafficke of Merchandiſe, as well for their owne trade and commerce with others, as for others trading into Spaine; among whom Sigiſmond, the young and new elected King of Polonia, found himſelfe moſt agrieved: whoſe Ambaſſador for that buſineſſe unto the Queene was one Paulus de Ialine, a Polone Gentleman, learned, eloquent, and very audacious, (if not over-much) who bringing * letters of credence from his King, had audience at Greenwich, her Majeſty ſitting under her Cloth of Eſtate, and with her Nobles, attending the ſumme of his meſſage, which the Polonian began with more then an ordinary Grace.

Sigiſmond King of Polonia his Ambaſſage to the Queene. * Dated 19. of May.

July 25.

(286) Whoſe tenour was filled with blaſts of diſcontent, conceived by the Potent Maſter the King of Polonia, and cauſed by the grievances of his Merchants, who not onely were deprived of ſome privi-ledges in England, but the Sea which is made free by the Omnipotent ſtopped, and the trades of his Merchants into Spaine by her Highneſſe Edicts debarred, contrary to the law both of Nature and of Nations: that his Maſter as he could not be moved to diminiſh any part of his love towards her Majeſty, ſo yet could he not but relieve his owne ſubjects; and the rather for that it touched all his Nobilities; whoſe revenues conſiſted chiefly upon the Trade of Merchandizing. That he had hitherto forborne all meanes of requite, though her Majeſty well knew, of meanes he had no want; and now had ſent to adverтiſe her Highneſſe in a loving manner by him his Ambaſſador, ſeeing that his letters to that purpoſe heretofore ſent, had not beene regarded; in whoſe name he now required, that the Seas might be open, a reſtitution made, and the Trade Weſtward to Spaine free, according to equitie; otherwiſe his Maſter would no longer neglect his Subjects loſſes, but would take in hand a meanes of redreſſe. As for her Majeſties warres with Spaine, that ought not to hinder Navigation by the common Law of Nature (as he avouched) nor for her reſpect ſhould the ancient friendſhip betwixt the potent Polonian and the mighty King of Spaine be broken, nor with the houſe of Auſtria, whoſe daughter his Prince had now married, which bound him in a double band of love. But he truſted (his Maſters requeſt bearing ſuch equitie) her Majeſtie would regard it, and command ſatisfaction of theſe things forthwith to be made, to the content of his Prince, and ſafetie of her ſelfe; which thing he wiſhed, and thereof warned her Majeſtie. And with other like words ended as peremptorily as he began.

The ſumme of the Ambaſſadors Oration.

(288) Oh how was I deceived! I looked for an Embassage, but thou hast brought me complaints; I understood by thy letters that thou wert a Legate, but I finde thee an Heraud, never since I drew breath heard I such an Oration. I marvell truly, I marvell at so great and such unaccustomed boldnesse in so publike an assembly; neither doe I thinke if the King thy Master were present, that hee would say so much: but if peradventure he hath committed any such thing to thy charge (which surely I doe much doubt) it is to be imputed unto him, that where the King is of yeares unripe, and not by bloud, but by election (yea and but newly advanced) hee doth not so perfectly understand the course of negotiating these kinde of affaires with other Princes, which either his Ancestors have observed with us, or perhaps others will observe, who afterwards shall succeed him. As touching thy selfe, indeed thou seemest to me to have read many Bookes, but not to have perused the Bookes of Princes affaires, but utterly to bee ignorant what is convenient amongst Kings. And whereas thou makest mention of the Law of Nature and Nations; know, that this is the Law both Naturall and Nationall, that when Warre is waged among Princes, it is lawfull for one of them to intercept the military helps of the other, brought from what place soever, so to prevent the harmes which might otherwise redound on himselfe: And this againe I avow to be the Law of Nature and Nations. Whereas likewise thou mentionest a new affinitie with the House of Austria, which now thou makest so famous, and of so deare esteeme, forget not Sir, that there have beene of that house that would have bereft the Kingdome of Polonia from thy King. As for other points which bee not to be spoken of at this place, and time, because they are many and severally to be considered of one after another: thou shalt wait for such further answer as shall be resolved on by some of my Councell, to whom I will affigne the consideration of this matter: In the meane time farewell and be quiet. And thus Lion-like tising, daunted the malepert Orator no lesse with her stately port and majesticall departure, then with the tartnesse of her princely checks: and turning to the Traine of her Attendants, thus said; Gods death my Lords (for that was her oath ever in anger) I have beene enforced this day to scowre my old Latine, that hath laine long in rusting.

An Ambassador from the King of Denmarke.

Septem. 7.

(289) To entreate a Peace betwixt these Christian Princes of England and Spaine, the King of Denmarke likewise did send an Ambassage unto Queene Elizabeth, as also to deliver the Garter worne by his Predecessor lately departed this world, with an earnest entreatie to continue the amitie betwixt their two Realmes. The man Arnald Whitfield Chancellor of Denmarke, judicious, learned, and wise, who with farre better temper and termes well couched, delivered his Oration; which ended, he most humbly propounded certaine requests (whereunto her Majesty presently replyed) which in effect were these.

The Danish Ambassadors requests.

(290) 1. That the League of peace confirmed betwixt the Crownes of England and Denmarke might be continued as formerly it had beene in the late deceased Kings dayes; and other his Predecessors, which now the present King his Master did instantly desire: To which shee answered: that she was most willing thereunto, wishing that the now-King would preserve the same amitie no worse then his Predecessors had done.

2 That whereas much Christian bloud was spilt in these continuall warres betwixt England, & Spaine, it would please her Majesty to give her consent, that the King his Master might make a motion of Peace; and as he found the occasion, so to proceed. Whereunto shee replyed, that shee thought his King was too young, and unexperienced, to conceive throughly the cause of breach betwixt her, and Spaine; and as the League had not beene broken on her part, or with her royall consent, so an accord should not be sought after by her, nor by any in her behalfe, for (quoth shee) I would have the King of Denmarke, and all Princes Christian, and Heathen to know, that England hath no need to crave Peace; nor my selfe endured one houres feare since I attained the Crowne thereof, being guarded with so valiant and faithfull Subjects.

An heroicke answer of an undaunted Queene.

3 His third request was, if it stood with her Majesties good liking, to permit open traffique, that the Merchants of Denmarke might transport their goods into Spaine without danger on the narrow Seas as heretofore some of them had sustained to their great losse. Her Majesties answer was, that it was to her unknowne, that any of his Masters good Subjects were in any wise molested, or their goods stayed, and that upon just proofe thereof made, a redresse shall be ordained, to the full satisfaction of the King and content of his Subjects.

4 Lastly, he was to returne the Garter, (wherewith her Majesty had honoured the late deceased King) as the manner is of forraigne Princes to doe, which hee with great reverence there delivered; Which her Majesty accepting; yet told him, thee was right sorry to receive it, for thereby shee was put in minde of the losse of a most Noble Brother, and a most loving friend. But howsoever the Danish Merchants now complained of losse, the English Marchandize were arrested in the Sound, for release whereof, Ambassadors were sent into Denmarke, where a restitution was made by the King, with such honour and bountie, as well satisfied her Majestie, and contented her Merchants.

(291) But a more dangerous Agent, working for Spaine, was the Irish Tir-Oen, who serpent-like lay lurking upon his advantage to raise the Standard of Rome, and to divert subjection from the English Crowne. This mans fortunes we have formerly declared, how being the sonne of a Bastard, and a banished fugitive, he was raised by her Majesties * meere bountie to the dignitie of an Earle, and stood in authoritie ranked with the best; nor so onely, but being twice in danger of capitall crimes (once for a murther, next for usurping the Title of O-Neale) upon better hopes of her princely clemency, twice got pardon for his life. The times now dangerous, and Ireland too ready to receive forraine powers, it was thought convenient to imploy Sir John Norris (that famous Warriour) into those parts, with thirteene hundred of the Netherland old Souldiers, newly retired from the warres in Britaine.

Tir-Oens rebellion in Ireland.

* See Cambdens Brit. in Ireland.

Sir John Norris sent into Ireland.

(292) Hugh Baron of Dungannon, now Earle of Tir-Oen, fearing left the English would make their nests where himselfe meant to build, namely, in some Castle at the mouth of Lough-Earne, suddenly assailed the Fort of Black-water, by which the entry lay into his Country, and got it by surrender. Which done, done, he wrote to Kildare, to side with him against his wrongs received of the Lord Deputy; yea and at the same instant, to Sir John Norris (appointed Lord Generall) that he might be mildly dealt with, and not bee driven headlong upon the dangerous rockes of disloyalty.

Tir-Oen fleth flying out.

Tir-Oen gets the fort of Blacke-water.

(293) But how his loyalty stood affected unto Her Majesty (his raiser) was well perceived by the powers which he retained about him, being alwayes guarded with a thousand horsemen, and sixe thousand two hundred and fourescore foot of Vlster, besides two thousand three hundred of Conaugh, which ever lay ready at his command; whereupon all of them being proclaimed Traitors; the flames of rebellion began more violently to burst forth, which for a long time, and not without losse of much bloud could hardly bee quenched: for though the Lord Generall were not inferiour in strength of men, yet the advantages of the enemy were such, that the time was rather spent in taking of booties, and frivolous Parlies, then in any memorable exploit; the one part waiting for fitter opportunities, and the other looking every day for his promised succours from Spaine.

He an his adherents proclaimed.

(294) But to spare the effusion of Christian blood Queene Elizabeth who ever minded Mercy more then Iustice, caused her Treasurer and Cheife Iusticiary of that Kingdome, as her Commissioners to conferre with this discontented Earle, and others his adherents before whom, Tir-Oen complained of wrongs offered him by Sir Henry Bagnall Marshall, aswell to the prejudice of his estate, as of his esteeme with the Queene, the Lord Deputy, Lord Generall, and others, and thereupon exhibited a Petition in humble manner containing these requests; That himselfe and all his followers might be pardoned of their crimes, and bee restored to their former estates; that they might freely exercise their Romish Religion without molestation; that no Garrison Souldiers, Shiriffe, or other Officer should interdeale within the jurisdiction of his Earledome: that the company of fifty horsemen with the Queenes pay might bee restored to him, in the same State as formerly hee had lead them; that the spoilers of his Country and people might be punished, and that Sir Henry Bagnall should pay him a thousand pound promised in Dowry with his sister, whom Tir-Oen had married, and who was now deceased. Others likewise laid out their grievances conceived; such were O-Donell, Brian Mac-Hugh-Oge, Mac Mahun, and Ever Mac-Conley, who received most reasonable answers to all their demands.

Sir Hen. Wallop, Sir Rob. Gardiner.

Propositions made to the Rebels.

(295) But unto them the Commissioners likewise proposed certaine Articles: as, That they should forthwith lay downe their Armes, disperse their Forces, acknowledge submissively their disloyalties, admit the Queenes Officers in their Governments, reedifie the Forts they had defaced, suffer the Garrisons to live without disturbance, make restitutions of spoiles taken, confesse upon their oath how farre they had dealt with forraigne Princes, and finally to renounce all forraigne ayde. But these propositions not pleasing the palate of those Rebels, they departed with a resolution to maintaine their owne demands. Which mooved Norris the Generall ayded with the Lord Deputy to march with his Army unto Armagh; whose approach (ever dreadfull to his enemies) when Tir-Oen heard of, in great perplexity hee forsooke the Fort of Blacke-water, set on fire the villages about, and plucked downe the Towne of Dungannon, with part of his owne house, bewayling his estate to be past recovery; and was so much dejected in minde, as hee fought nothing else but where to hide his rebellious head.

Preparations against Tir-Oen.

(296) The Country now wasted, and no victuals to bee had, Norris set a Garrison in the Church of Armagh, strengthned Monahan, and proclaimed Tir-Oen Traytor in his owne territories. Which done, hee stayed in Vlster without any great deeds of martiall importance, onely Tir-Oen to gaine time presented unto him a fained submission, signed with his owne hand, cast himselfe downe (a rare and uncouth ceremony) at the Queenes pictures seer, ungirt his sword, and craved pardon upon his knees: and yet in the meane time dealt hee for aydes out of Spaine, and so far prevailed, as that Messengers were sent from King Philip with capitulations that the King of Spaine at a time prefixed should send them a competent Army to joyne with the Irish, that all conditions of peace with the English should bee rejected, and that the Rebels should bee furnished with munition from Spaine.

Blacke-water againe besieged.

(297) Hereupon (though there was a cessation from Armes) hee fell to harry and waste the Country, to burne villages, to drive away booties, and having done what hee could or would, as it were pricked in conscience, hee once againe put on the vizard of simulation, and sued for pardon and peace: which the better to effect, he sent the letters of King Philips promises unto the L. Deputy, with the causes of his owne discontents, which mooved him to doe what he did. And surely such was his dexterity, or his Destiny, or the English no lesse dangerous, then frequent security, negligence and confidence, or the sparing of money by the grand disbursers, or the inbred lenity of the too-clement Queene, that his faire words were ever believed, and his foule offences pardoned: but whose fault soever, most of Conaugh was now revolted, all Vlster rebellious, onely seven Castles kept for the Queene.

The Lord Burroughs dyeth in Ireland.

(298) In which desperate estate, Thomas Lord Burrough, a man full of courage, was sent Lord Deputy into Ireland; who no sooner arrived, but Norris either crossed by some higher-swaying Powers or by his fortune in these his proceedings (the services there being farre different from those his others, in other parts imployed) through griefe and discontent (the too usuall guerdon of many a Noble Servitor) as was thought, ended his life.

(299) The Lord Deputy no sooner had received the sword, and taken the charge of the Kingdome of Ireland, but hee made forward to meete with the Rebels, holding it good policy to cut off delayes, which commonly increase the abilities of the enemy. Tir-Oen on the other side, as boldly made his resistance, and in a dangerous service encountered him at the Moiry, where the Lord Borrough by his valour made the way, and most valiantly wanne the Fort of Blacke-water, (repaired and reenforced by the Rebels) the onely strength (besides Woods) that the Tir-Oen had. To rescue this Peece, immediately the enemy shewed himselfe: against whom Henry Earle of Kildare presently marching with a Coronet of Horse, and certaine volunaries, (Gentlemen of the better sort) where hee discomfited the enemy, though with losse of some men of note; as of Francis Vaughan, brother to the Lord Deputies wife, Robert Turner Sergeant Maior, and the two Foster-brethren of the Earle Kildare, whose deaths he so tooke, as within few dayes after, himselfe dyed for very griefe.

(300) The Fort re-enforced with men and Munition, and the Lord Deputy upon fervice in other parts; Tir-Oen now wavering betweene hope, feare, and shame, thought best to assay it by siege, as the place of greatest importance to further his designes; for that lost, hee saw his fortunes must downe, and thereupon with his strongest power, he beleaguered it. The Lord Deputy hearing thereof, prepared straightway to relieve the place, and marching with full pace and assurance of victory, whether through too forward a minde, distemperature of body, ayre, or of bogges, arrested hee was with sickenesse, and violently cut off, by untimely death, leaving to Her Majesty a misse in Her Irish Estate, and a further security to the ranging Rebels.

(301) The

An. Dom. 1598. The Earle of Ormond Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

(301) The government of Ireland was then committed to the Earle of Ormond under the Title of Lieutenant Generall of the Army, and unto the Lord Chancellour Sir Robert Gardiner; unto whom Tir-Oen (after his accuſtomed manner) in a long letter recapitulated his great grievances, leaving not out the leaſt offence, of the Souldiers, or actions of the Sheriffes; his breach of covenants with Sir John Norris hee coldly excuſeth, and laid his complaints againſt his enemies (the Engliſh) who had intercepted and ſuppreſſed his ſubmiſſion to the Queene, that they had raiſed intollerable impoſitions upon the Nobles, and Commons; and that the revenues of Ireland was ſhared among Counſellors, Lawyers, Souldiers, and Notaries: by which and other like overtures, it was manifeſt that hee intended to extirpate the Engliſh quite out of Ireland.

(302) All this while his Siege lay before the Fort, of Blacke-water; for the raiſing whereof, Sir Henry Bagnall (the bitteреſt enemy that Tir-Oen ever had) with foureteene Enſignes of the choiſeſt troopes were ſent, whom the Earle met neere unto Armagh; and being egged on with a fretfull deſire of revenge, bent all his force againſt the Marſhall, where began a bloudy conflict, and was continued with the death of that worthy Souldier (fighting amongſt the thickeſt) whereby Tir-Oen obtained not onely a joyous triumph over his private enemy, but withall went away with a glorious victory over the Engliſh, who never ſince they firſt ſet footing in Ireland received ſo great an overthrow: for therein thirteene valiant Captaines loſt their lives, fifteene hundred common Souldiers were rowted and put to ſhamefull flight, diſperſed and cut in peeces. Vpon this diſaſter the Garriſon Souldiers (having with loyall hearts and weapons in hand, unto extreame famine, and exceeding diſtreſſe, held out to the laſt) laſtly ſurrended the Peece of Blacke-water unto the Rebels; by which overthrow and ſurrender, the Iriſh became furniſhed with armour and munition to maintaine their warres, and Tir-Oen renowned all the Realme over, as their onely Horatius, and founder of their freedome.

The Engliſh foiled at Blacke-watter.

(303) Himſelfe over-joyed with theſe gotten victories, ſwelled above meaſure with an haughty arrogancy, commanding all things as ſole Monarch of Ireland. Into Munſter hee ſent Owny Mac-Rory-Og-O-More with foure thouſand preying rogues, to forrage the Country, and the rabble that daily reſorted unto them, burnt the houſes of the Engliſh, ranſacked their ſubſtance, and killed very many; James Fitz-Thomas one of the family of the Deſmonds they ſet up as Earle of Deſmond, yet ſo, that hee ſhould hold as Tenant in Fee of the O-Neale, (the Earle of Tir-Oen) and thus after a month, when they had kindled this fire and fet Munſter in a flame, they returned laded with rich booties and ſpoile. Tir-Oen in the meane time had ſent his letters to King Philip of Spaine, wherein he founded his victories with a full trumpet, aſſuring him that hee would heare of no peace with the Engliſh, were the conditions never ſo indifferent, and would for his part inviolately keepe his promiſes with the Spaniſh King.

Robert Earle of Eſſex Lieutenant of Ireland.

(304) In this deſperate eſtate ſtood Ireland when Queene Elizabeth choſe Robert Earle of Eſſex, to bee Lord Lieutenant and Governour-Generall thereof: a Peere in regard of his approoved wiſedome, fortitude, and fidelity, thought fitteſt to repaire the detriments and loſſes therein ſuſtained, and in ſuch deere eſteeme with his ſoveraigne, and intire love of the people, as the heavens ſeemed to have framed him for the delight of man. In whom ſhined all ſparkles of true Nobility and Martiall honor, had not fortune marred all that the other graces had made. His commiſſion was large, and authority great, and led no leſſe then twenty thouſand compleat Souldiers, whereof ſixteene thouſand were foote, and the reſt horſe-men, ſo well furniſhed and provided, as the like had never beene ſeene before in Ireland.

(305) Thus honourably accompanyed with the flower of Engliſh Gallants, and well-wiſhing acclamations of the people, with a ſtrange thunderclap in a cleere Sunne-ſhine day, hee ſet forward from London, and arriving in Ireland, received the ſword; where (toward the end of March) falling in counſell touching his affaires, it was thought fitteſt by wiſe Statiſts, that Munſter ſhould bee cleared of thoſe petty Rebels lying neerer, and of more validity then the remote Vlſter, of ſmall wealth and leſſe account. Whereupon contrary to his owne opinion formerly delivered (whiles hee was in England) and his directions from Her Majeſty in Ireland, hee made firſt into Munſter, and became terrible unto the Rebels of thoſe parts, chaſing them before him into the woods, and ſo cleared that Province, with more expence of time, and loſſe of men, then was heere well liked by the State.

The Earle of Eſſex enters Munſter.

(306) Hence hee made into Leinſter, againſt the O-Comors and O-Miales, who had gathered head and taken Armes againſt their obedience; whom in light skirmiſhes he fortunately vanquiſhed; whence he ſent Sir Conyers Clifford Governour of Conaugh one way towards Bellike, whilſt hee himſelfe tooke another way, ſo to diſtract the force of Tir-Oen. Sir Conyers with a power of fifteene hundred ſtrong marched over the Mountaines of Curlew, where O-Roirke and his Rebels ſuddenly aſſailed them, being out-wearied with travell, and their powder neere ſpent; in which conflict, amongſt many other ſlaine, Sir Conyers Clifford himſelfe, as alſo Sir Alexander Ratcliffe, ſealed the teſtimony of their valours with the loſſe of their lives.

Sir Conyers Clifford incountred with, and ſlaine.

(307) The Lord Generall hearing of this overthrow, made towards Vlſter, and came into the frontiers as farre as Louth, where Tir-Oen, on the other ſide of the River, from the Hilles made his Bravado: But falling into his wonted vaine of diſſimulation, defired a parley with the Lord Lieutenant, which hee altogether rejecting, anſwered, that if the Earle would conferre with him, hee ſhould find him the next morning in the head of his troopes: on which day, when after a light skirmiſh, a horſe-man of Tir-Oens troopes, with a loud voyce cried, that the Earle was not willing to fight, but to parley upon peace with the Lord Generall; it was againe denyed him. But the next day, as the Lord Lieutenant was in his March forward, one Hagan ſent from Tir-Oen, met him, and declared that the Earle muſt humbly deſired to have the Queenes mercy and peace; and withall beſought, that his Lordſhip would bee pleaſed to afford him audience, which if hee would grant, then would hee with all reverence attend him at the Foord of the River not farre from Louth.

He entertyneth. Septe. 13.

Tir-Oen ſuſeth for Parley, but is rejected.

(308) To this laſtly the Lord Lieutenant aſſented, and ſent to diſcover the place, and beſtowing a troope of horſe upon the next Hill, came downe alone unto the River; Tir-Oen attending on the other ſide, no ſooner ſaw his approach, but forthwith rode his horſe into the River up to the Saddle, and with all ſemblances of a dutifull reſpect, moſt reverently ſaluted his Lordſhip: where, having had conference the ſpace of an houre, they both returned unto their companies. There followed the Earle of Eſſex, Con, a baſe ſonne of Tir-Oen, inſtantly intreating in his fathers name, that certaine principall men might bee admitted to a conference, whereunto his honour condiſcended.

Eſſex and Tir-Oen meet in Parley.

A further conference.

(309) And taking with him the Earle of Southhampton, Sir George Bourchier, Sir Warham St. Leger, Sir Henry Dawvers, Sir Edward Wingfield; and Sir William Conſtable, went to the Foord, where Tir-Oen, with his brother Cormoc, Mac Gennys, Mac Guir, Ever Mac Cowley, Henry Ovington, and O-Quin, attended their comming. And falling in conference, in

it was concluded that certaine Commiſſioners ſhould the next day meet for a treaty of peace, and in the meane time there ſhould bee a ceſſation of warres, from ſixe weekes to ſixe weekes, untill the firſt of May: yet ſo, as it might be free on both ſides, after foureteene dayes warning given, to reſume hoſtilitie a-freſh. And if any of Tir-Oens confederates would not thereto conſent, to be proſecuted at the Lord Lieutenants pleaſure.

Exceptions againſt effects his ſervices.

(310) But howſoever theſe his proceedings pleaſed the Marſhaliſts, yet was her Majeſty highly incenſed, that ſuch expeditions had beene made without her directions, being informed that the Spring, Summer, and Autumne, were ſpent without ſervice upon the Arch-Rebell, that her men were diminiſhed, and large ſummes of money conſumed, without doing that for which he was ſent; that by this meanes the Rebels were encouraged, and the Kingdome of Ireland laid at hazard to bee loſt: Which his defaults (for ſo they were apprehended) were (as he conceived) much aggravated, by ſome that were hard againſt him, in her attentive eare, upon which ſurmize Her Majeſties ſharpe Letters received (though he had excuſed his ſervice by others, whom himſelfe ſent at the ſame ſeaſon) ſo over-preſſed his troubled thoughts, as leaving his charge to be managed by others, he made into England, well hoping to pacifie his Soveraignes diſpleaſure with ſatisfaction from his owne mouth, and at Nonefuch had acceſſe to her preſence, where after a ſhort welcome, he was commanded to his Chamber; and ſoone after was committed to the cuſtody of the Lord Keeper.

An. Dom. 1599. Septem. 28 Octob. 2.

(311) No ſooner almoſt was the Lord Generall departed Ireland, but that Tir-Oen (notwithſtanding the ceſſation from warre) drawing his Forces together, addreſſed himſelfe for the Field, unto whom Sir William Warren was ſent, to charge him with breach of promiſe; but hee ſwelling in pride, peremptorily anſwered, that his doings were according to covenants, having given warning before, and his cauſe juſt, for that the Lord Lieutenant was committed in England, upon whoſe honour hee repoſed his whole Eſtate; neither would hee have any thing to doe with the Counſellors of Ireland, in whom (as he ſaid) he never found either ſafetie or truth: And thereupon preſuming upon Spaine, and giving it forth that there would be ſhortly an alteration in England; hee ſends O-Donell into Connaught, receiveth tumultuous perſons, ſtrengtheneth the weake, and comforteth the diſtruſtfull, glorying every where that he would reſtore againe the ancient Religion, and liberty of Ireland, and expell the Engliſh from thence; to which end, ſome Money and Munition were ſent him from Spaine, with Indulgences from Rome; and (for an eſpeciall favour) the Pope ſent him a Plume of Phœnix Feathers, for a trophey of his victories, as Vrban long before him ſent a Coronet of Peacocks Tayles unto King Iohn, when hee was firſt inveſted Lord of Ireland.

Tir-Oen againe falls off.

The Popes Preſent beſtowed on Tir-Oen.

(312) Tir-Oen thus feathered for a higher flight, Peacocke-like to ſhew his owne pride and greatneſſe by his perſonall preſence, under a religious pretext to worſhip a peece of the woodden Croſſe of Chriſt, reputed to bee kept in the Monaſtery of the Holy Croſſe in Tipperary, in the mid-winter would thither on Pilgrimage; whence he ſent out Mac-Guir with a number of rifeling Robbers, to deſpoyle and prey on the peaceable Subjects; with whom Sir Warham Saint Leger met, and at the firſt Race with his Lance ranne Mac-Guir through the body, and was by him runne through himſelfe. Whereupon Tir-Oen fearing more blowes, made ready to returne from Munſter ſooner then was expected, or himſelfe meant.

The Lord Mountjoy Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

(313) At this time Charles Blunt, Lord Mountjoy (afterwards created Earle of Dewnſhire) was ſent Lord Lieutenant Generall into Ireland, who with ſmall port and little ſolemnitie, entred upon the Government, the ſtate of that Countrey lying deſperately diſeaſed, and almoſt paſt recovery. At his firſt comming, hearing that Tir-Oen was to depart Mounſter, he haſtned to ſtop his paſſage in Feread, and there to give him Battell, which the Earle prevented by taking another way, having intelligence of the Lord Generals deſignes; but the Spring drawing on, the Deputy put himſelfe on his March towards Vlſter, with purpoſe to drive the Earle to a ſtand, whiles Sir Henry Docwra at Lough-foile, and Sir Mathew Morgan at Baliſhanon planted the Garriſons, which they with ſmall adoe effected, and ſuppreſſed the Rebels in divers overthrowes.

An. Dom. 1600. In Febru.

In May.

(314) The Lord Generall likewiſe held Tir-Oen very hard, and with light skirmiſhes ever put him to the worſe, ſo that he now perceiving his fortune to goe backe, with-drew himſelfe backe into his old corners. The Lord Lieutenant then entred into Leaſe, the place of refuge and receit of all the Rebels in Leinſter, where he ſlew Owy-Mac-Rory Og, chiefe of the Family of the O-Mores, a bloudy, bold, and deſperate young man: and ſo chaſed out the reſt of thoſe his Rake-hels, as that never ſince they were ſeene in thoſe parts. And although in the commencing of theſe affaires, the Equinox was paſt, and the Winter weather begun in that Climate, yet marched he forward to the entrance of the Moyery three miles beyond Dundalke.

(315) The paſſage into Vlſter is every where naturally cumberſome, and this way made more by the Rebels, who had fortified and blocked up the entrance with fences of ſtakes ſtucke in the ground, with hurdles joyned together, and ſtones in the midſt, with turfes of earth laid betwixt hils, woods, and bogges, and manned the place with a number of Souldiers: notwithſtanding, the Engliſh brake through thoſe Paliſadoes, and beating the enemies backe, the Lord Deputie placed a Garriſon eight miles from Armagh, where in memory of Sir Iohn Norris, hee named the Fort Mount-Norris: but to omit many other skirmiſhes in his remoue, that at Carlingford was moſt famous, where the enemies aſſembled to ſtop his way, were all of them diſcomfited, and put to ſeaſefull flight.

(316) In the midſt of Winter hee entred the glinnes, that is, the Vallies of Leinſter, a ſecure receptacle of the Rebels, where he brought into ſubjection Donel Spaniogh, Phelim Mac-Feogh, and the O-Tooles, of whom hee tooke hoſtages. Then went he to Fereall, and drave Tirell, the moſt approved warrior of all the Rebels, from his faſtneſſe, (that is, his bogges and buſhes) into Vlſter; the Territory of Fernes he laid waſte, ſpoyled Fues, and in Breany placed a Garriſon, receiving ſuch into mercy as delivered up hoſtages. Which done, and the Spring approaching, he marched to Vlſter, fortified Armagh, and went ſo farre forward, that he removed Tir-Oen from the Fort of Blacke-water, who had very artificially encamped himſelfe there.

The Glinnes cleered of Rebels.

(317) As the Lord Generall was thus buſied to reduce Ireland to obedience, ſo the Pope and Spaine ſtudied to hold up Tir-Oen, and to maintaine the Rebellions; their Agents were a Spaniard, elected by the Pope Archbiſhop of Dublin, the Biſhop of Clonfort, the Biſhop of Killalee, and Archer a Ieſuite. Theſe by Prayer, and promiſes of heavenly rewards, wonne Philip to ſend ſuccours into Ireland, which forthwith he did, under his Generall Don Iohn D' Aquila, a man of a conceited hope that all would be his, as confident of much aid from the titular Earle Deſmond, and from Florence Mac-Carty, a Rebell of great might; wherein hee was deceived: for Sir George Carew, Lord Preſident of Munſter, had prevented that deſigne, and ſent them priſoners into England, where they were kept ſure.

The Pope and Spaine buſied to hold up Tir-Oen.

Don Iohn D'Aquila ſent into Ireland.

(318) Don D' Aquila with two thouſand Spaniards, all of them old trained Souldiers, with certaine Iriſh Fugitives, landed at Kinſale in Mounſter, the last of October, and straightwayes publiſhed a Writing, wherein he glorioufly ſtiled himſelfe with this Title, Maſter Generall, and Captaine of the Catholike King in the Warres of GOD, for holding and keeping the Faith in Ireland; endeavouring to make the World beleive, that Queene Elizabeth, by the definitive ſentences of the Popes, was deprived of her Kingdomes, and her Subjects abſolved and freed from their Oath of Allegiance, and that he was come to deliver them out of the Divels jawes, and the Engliſh tyranny; upon which ſuggeſtions, many diſtempered and wicked perſons began to bandy on his ſide.

(319) The Lord Deputy gathering his Companies, haſted to Kinſale, and encamped neere unto the Towne on the Land ſide, whiles Sir Richard Leviſon with two of the Queenes Ships incloſed the Haven, to forbid all acceſſe to the Spaniard; when from both ſides, the thundering Cannon played upon the Towne: but newes being brought that two thouſand Spaniards more were arrived at Bere-haven, Baltimore, and Caſtle-Haven, Sir Richard was imployed upon them, in which ſervice he ſunke five of their Ships.

A new ſupply of Spaniards under Alphonſo O-Campo.

(320) Vnto theſe new landed Spaniards, whoſe Leader was Alphonſo-O-Campo, O-Donel over the ice, by ſpeedy journies and unknowne by wayes repayred, unſeene of the Engliſh; and a few dayes after Tir-Oen himſelfe, with O-Rorcke, Raimund Burke, Mac-Mahun, Randall Mac-Surley, Tirrell, the Baron of Lixnaw, and the moſt ſelected choice of all the Rebels came unto them, who muſtered together, made ſixe thouſand Foot, and five hundred Horſe; all confident of victory, as being freſh, ſtrong, and exceeding in number, where, the Engliſh were out-wearied through Winter ſiege, with ſcarſitie of victuall, and their Horſe weake with ſore travell.

Tir-Oens bravadoes.

(321) In this hope, Tir-Oen, upon an Hill not a mile from the Engliſh Campe, made a Bravado two dayes together, intending to have put theſe new ſupplyes of Spaniards, with eight hundred Iriſh, by night into Kinſale, as by Letters intercepted from Don D' Aquila did appeare. Which to prevent, the Lord Deputie appointed eight Enſignes to keepe watch, and himſelfe with the Preſident of Munſter, and the Marſhall, at the foot of the Hill, choſe out a convenient plot to give the Earle Battell, who the next morning ſeeing the Engliſh ſo forward, by his Bag-pypers ſounded the retreat, whom the Lord Generall followed, and forced them to ſtand in the brinke of a bogge, where their Horſemen were diſordered, and rowted by the Earle of Clan Ricard.

The Rebels rowted.

(322) The maine battell then wavering in feare, was violently charged by the Lord Deputie himſelfe, who in his directions diſcharged the part of a worthy Commander, and in fighting, the Office of a valiant Souldier; for the Rebels not able to withſtand his fury, brake their arrayes, and in diſorder confuſedly fled; in whoſe purſuit many of them felt the revenging edge of the Engliſh Sword. Tir-Oen, O-Donell, and the reſt flung away their weapons, and ſaved their lives by flight; but Alphonſo O-Campo, with three other Spaniſh Captaines, and ſixe Enſigne Bearers, were taken priſoners, nine of their Enſignes borne away by the Engliſh, and twelue hundred of his Spaniards ſlaine; ſuch welcome found theſe new gueſts in Ireland. This victory obtained, both quelled the pride of the intruding Spaniards, and exceedingly daunted the hearts of the diſloyall Iriſh; ſo that Tir-Oen was forced into his ſtarting holes in Vlſter, O-Donell driven into Spaine, and the reſt of that rebellious rabble ſcattered into obſcure places, where their beſt ſuccour was to play leaſt in ſight.

Don Alphonſo taken Priſoner.

The Rebels diſperſed.

(323) The Lord Generall returning to the ſiege of Kinſale, began to raiſe rampiers, and to mount his Cannons neerer the Towne, wherein ſixe dayes were ſpent without any impeach from the Spaniard, whoſe courage being cut by the loſſe of their fellowes, ſought rather how to get cleare and be gone, then to adventure reſiſtance againſt ſuch a warlike oppoſer. D' Aquila hereupon ſent his Letters by his Drum Major to the Lord Deputy, wherein hee craved, that ſome Gentleman of credit might be ſent into the Towne, with whom he might Parley for a Peace. Whereunto his Lordſhip inclined, and to that end ſent thither Sir William Godolphin.

The Spaniards ſue for Peace.

(324) Vnto whom D' Aquila ſignified, that he had found the Lord Deputy, though his eager enemy, yet an honourable perſon, the Iriſh of no valour, rude and uncivill, yea, and (that which hee ſore feared) perfidious and falſe: That hee was ſent from the King of Spaine his Maſter to aid two Earles, and now he much doubted whether there were any ſuch in Rerum natura, conſidering that one tempeſtuous puffe of warre had blowen the one of them into Spaine, and the other into the North, ſo as they were no more to be ſeene: willing therefore hee was to treat about a Peace, that might be good for the Engliſh, and not hurtfull to the Spaniards; albeit he wanted nothing requiſite to the holding out of the Siege, and expected every day out of Spaine freſh ſupplies to finde the Engliſh worke and trouble enough.

(325) The matter thus propoſed, and the Engliſh weake and weary through a long Winters ſiege, the Lord Deputy conſented to an agreement, the Articles whereof were theſe.

January 2.

1 That John D' Aquila ſhould quit the places which he held in the Kingdome of Ireland, aſwell in the Towne of Kinſale, as the Forts and Caſtle of Baltimore, Berehaven, and Caſtle-haven; and ſhould deliver them unto the Lord Deputy, or to whom hee ſhould appoint.

John Siton.

(2) That Don D' Aquila and his Spaniards ſhould depart with Armes, Money, Munition, and Banners diſplayed; the Souldiers notwithſtanding to beare no Armes againſt the Queene of England, till ſuch time as they were unſhipped in ſome part of Spaine.

Concluſions of Peace.

3 That Ships and Victuals ſhould bee granted unto them in their departure, for their Money, and at ſuch reaſonable prizes as the Countrey could afford.

4 That if contrary winds inforced them into any other Port of Ireland, or elſe into England, they might be intreated as friends, with ſafetie of harbour, and proviſions neceſſary for their money to further their departure.

5 That a ceſſation ſhould be from warre, a ſecuritie from injuries, and victuall granted at reaſonable rates, whiles they remained in preparing for Spaine.

6 That the Ships in which they ſhould bee imbarked, might freely paſſe by other Engliſh Ships without moleſtation; and the Shippes arrived in Spaine, might ſafely returne backe without any impeachment of the Spaniards: for ſecuritie whereof, the ſaid D' Aquila ſhould deliver for hoſtages ſuch three of their Captaines as the Lord Deputy would chuſe. Vnto theſe Articles Don Iohn ſolemnely ſwore, on the behalfe of the Catholike King his Maſter, and with his hand ſubſcribed his name, Don Iohn D' Aquila.

(326) The troubleſome clouds of moſt likely dangers, thus diſſolved in Munſters faire Ayre, the Coaſts of Ireland were ſhortly cleared of thoſe forraine intruders, who notwithſtanding their former great bragges, with ſhame and diſhonour embarked themſelves for home, their Companies being much empayred, and proud ſpirits brought downe. And now the Ben-hadad Tir-Oen, who had boaſted all Ireland was his, with fearefull flights and bywayes recovered his lurking holes in Vlſter; after hee had loſt moſt of his men, whom the ſwelling and violently-running Rivers, by reaſon of Winter flouds, had ſwallowed up; where his Traytors head, burdened with the dreads of his owne deſerts, could take no reſt, no not ſo much as to breathe without feare, diſtruſting every ſhadow that he ſaw, and ſhifting out of one by-corner, before hee well knew where to finde another.

The guilt and feares of Tir-Oen.

(327) Meane

(327) Meane whiles, the Lord Deputy refreſhed his weary and Winter beaten Souldiers, repayred the decayes, and renewed the Garriſons in Munſter; which done, hee departed for Dublin, where wearing out the Winter ſtormes, towards the Spring, by a gentle and eaſie march, well appointed, he returned into Vlſter, meaning to belay the Rebell on every ſide, by planting his Forts, ſo to take him in his toyle. Thus being approached unto Blackewater, hee tranſported his Army over the Foard upon floares, upon whoſe banke, beneath the old Fort, he erected a * new, to ſuch terror of the Arch-Rebell, as hee ſet on fire his owne Houſe at Dungannon, and got himſelfe ſtrike further from danger; whether the Lord Deputy immediately marched, and made ſpoyle without any ſpare; the Corne-fields were deſtroyed, the Villages fired, and booties brought in on every ſide. The Forts in Loghe, Crew, Lough-Reogh, and Moghor Lecowd, were yeilded up, and Garriſons placed in Lough Eaugh, or Sydney, and in Monaghan, whence with their continuall ſallies, they ſo croſſed the enemies, that ſeeing themſelves invironed about, and no way open for eſcape, like wilde Beaſts they hid their heads in the thickets, Forreſts, and Woods, muttering complaints againſt their late magnified Tir-Oen; exclaiming he had engaged the ruine of the whole Nation, for his owne private diſcontents, and that theſe warres, howſoever beneficiall to him, yet were they moſt pernicious unto them; whereupon changing their minds with their fortunes, began a vie, who ſhould be firſt in ſhewing their alteration, by comming in to the Deputy.

The Rebels exclaime againſt the Arch-Rebell.

(328) The Earle not ignorant how their affections declined, his owne forces ſhaken, and the fidelity of his followers more and more ſuſpected, hee once more determined to prevent the worſt, by his ſubmiſſion, which in humble Letters hee ſent to the Queene, wherein with prayers and teares he craved pardon of his faults: to ſuch an ebbe was the ſwelling tides of his rebellious heart brought. Her Majeſty (whoſe Nature was Mercy) ever diſtaſtive of bloud, gave the Lord Deputie authoritie to pardon his life, though hardly drawne to remit his offences, they being ſo many and great: His friends that affected him, and Mac-Baron his Brother, daily ſolicited the Deputy for his peace, which laſtly, upon an abſolute promiſe, to put his life and revenues, without any condition, to the will of the Queene, was granted; and at Melliſont, accompanied with two perſons and no more, had acceſſe into the Chamber of Preſence, where the Lord Deputy ſate in a Chaire of Eſtate, moſt of his Marſhalſts ſtanding about him.

(329) Tir-Oen in baſe and poore array, with a dejected countenance, at the very entrance fell downe upon his knees, and ſo reſted till he was commanded to ariſe, and come neerer; when ſtepping forward a few paces, he fell againe proſtrate, and like a moſt humble Supplicant, in words well couched (as cunning was he both in ſpeech and action) acknowledged his ſinnes againſt GOD, and fault unto her Majeſty; and thus began his ſubmiſſion to the Lord Generall.

In the royall clemency of my dread Soveraigne and moſt gracious Queene, I doe onely lay the hope and reſt of my now remaining eſtate; unto whoſe pleaſure I abſolutely remit my life, and whole revenues; and doe moſt ſubmiſſively deplore mine owne miſery, beſeeching againe her mercy, whoſe bountifull favours I have heretofore, and mightie powers now of late both felt and found; and well hope, that the fountaine of her ever-flowing graces are not drawne dry. Let mee (I pray) bee the ſubject, whereon her mercy may worke, and an example for ever of her mild clemency, both to divulge her Princely lenity, and to redeeme in ſome part the honour I have loſt. For age I am not ſo unſerviceable, nor of body ſo unable, neither in courage ſo dejected, but that my faithfull ſervice in her behalfe, may expiate and make ſome meaſure of ſatisfaction, for theſe my many and moſt diſloyall Rebellions. And yet I may juſtly complaine, that through the malicious envie of ſome, I have beene hardly and unfriendly dealt with, which may ſomewhat extenuate my crime and offence; for — But as hee was enforcing this point further, the Lord Deputy interrupted his ſpeech, and with a few words delivered with great authoritie, (which in a Marſhalliſt ſtands in ſtead of Eloquence) told him, that there was no excuſe to be heard, his crimes were too great; and thereupon commanded him to depart the Preſence: which hee did with a countenance ſeeming very heavy and ſad. The next day departing for Dublin, he tooke Tir-Oen thither, meaning to tranſport him for England, had not the death of the Queene hindered his deſigne. Theſe things premiſed, and Ireland thus recovered that was in hazard to be loſt, let us returne to our Engliſh affaires, from whence theſe Iriſh bogges have detained us too long.

(330) On what termes the Earle of Eſſex left Ireland, we have already heard, and to what lamentable ſucceſſe the height of his riſe brought him, is now to be related; wherein he may be the example of Fortunes dalliance, and of the unſtayed felicitie had in this life: a man indeed filled with the affection of his Prince and the Pedple, and fraught with honourable abilities to purchaſe both, untill by his owne unadviſednesſe (for ſo it muſt needs be cenſured) he clouded his honour, wiſedome, and loyalty, with the ſhadowes of his owne diſcontents. Whether his Soveraignes favours were the wings of his ambitions, or the dependancies of men of Warre, the pillars of his high hopes, I doe not cenſure; but that ſome ſecret under-workings gave fire to his paſſionate diſcontents, I doubt not, having ſeene his owne Letters penned in that behalfe. Howſoever, ſure it is, the Eye of Iealouſie ſtill attended him, and his doings now laſtly were more noted, then was made ſhew of: for being yet in Ireland with an eminent authoritie, followed with the flower and chiefeſt men of Warre, and ſuſpected to be too well reſpected by the Arch-Rebell Tir-Oen, it was held good policy (upon another pretended occaſion) to muſter Forces, and to make a Lord Lieutenant Generall of all England, which was, the Right Honourable Charles Howard, Earle of Nottingham, Lord high Admirall.

(331) The ſhew of this preparation was a preventing providence (as was pretended) againſt a Spaniſh Navy in new rigging for the Seas; and indeed ſuch preparation in that Summer was made, as the like had not beene in England ſince Queene Elizabeth came to the Crowne. For London was allotted to furniſh ſixteene Ships to the Seas, and ſixe thouſand Souldiers for the Land ſervice, whereof three thouſand were to reſt ever in a readineſſe, and the other three thouſand (all of them Houſholders) to attend and guard her Majeſties royall Perſon. And out of many Countries adjoyning, ſuch numbers of brave Horſe and Horſemen were gathered, as never till then had beene ſeene; the fame whereof was ſo farre ſpread, as neither Spaine, nor any other, could have any heart to make attempt this way.

(332) But the Earle of Eſſex arriving in England, not onely peaceably, but alſo very privately and unaccompanyed (as hath beene ſaid) and now remaining in the Lord Keepers cuſtody, was often and ſeriouſly dealt with, by that truly Honourable and provident Statiſt (of whom he was entirely affected) ſomewhat to decline his loftie ſoaring, leſt in mounting too high, hee ſhould melt his waxen wings againſt the hot Sunne, and not to ſuffer the ſore to feſter till it were paſt cure; to which purpoſe alſo he afterward wrote him a letter of pithy and ſapient perſwaſions, out of the abundance of his well-wiſhing heart; the coppy whereof we held worthy to be heere preſented.

The Lord Keeper to the Earle of Essex July 18. Ann. 1598.

(333) My very good Lord: It is often seene, that a slander by seeth more then hee that playeth the game; and for the most part every man in his owne cause, slandereth in his owne light, and seeth not so clearely as hee should. Your Lordship hath dealt in other mens causes, and in great and weighty affaires with great wisedome and judgement; now your owne is in hand, you are not to contemne or refuse the advise of any that loveth you, how simple soever. In this order I range my selfe; of those that love you none more simple, and none that loveth you with more true and honest affection: which shall pleade mine excuse, if you shall either mistake, or misconster, my words or meaning; but in your Lordships honourable wisdome I neither doubt nor suspect the one or other. I will not presume to advise you, but I will shoot my bolt, and tell you what I thinke. The beginning and too long continuing of this unseasonable discontent you have seene and prooved, by which you may aime at the end. If you hold still this course (which hitherto you find to be worse and worse, and the longer you goe, the farther out of the way) there is little hope or likelyhood that the end will be better. You are not yet so farre gone, but you may well returne; the returne is safe, the progresse dangerous and desperate.

In this course you hold, if you have any enemies, you doe that for them which they could never doe for themselves. Your friends you leave open to scorne and contempt; you forsake your selfe, and overthrow your fortunes, and ruinate your honour and reputation. You give that courage and comfort to the forraigne enemies, as greater they cannot have. For what can bee more welcome, or more pleasing newes unto them, then to heare that her Majesty and the Realme are maymed of so worthy a member, who hath so often and so valiantly quailed and danted them. You forsake your Countrey, when it hath most needs of your counsell or helpe. And lastly you faile in that indissoluble dutie which you owe to your most gracious Soveraigne. A dutie imposed upon you, not by nature or policy onely, but by that religious and sacred band, wherein the divine Majesty of Almighty God hath by the rule of Christianitie obliged you.

For the foure first, your constant resolution may perhaps moove you to esteeme them as light: but beeing well weighed they are not light, nor lightly to bee regarded. And for the two last, it may bee that the clearenesse of your inward conscience, may seeme to content your selfe. But that is not enough; these duties stand not onely in contemplation, or in inward meditation: their effects be externall action, and when that faileth, the substance faileth.

This being your present state and condition, what is to be done? what is the remedy? My good Lord I lacke wisedome and judgement to advise you; but I will never lacke an honest true heart to wish well, nor (being warranted by a good conscience) will feare to speake what I thinke.

I have begun plainely, lee not offended if I proceed so. Bene cedit, qui cedit tempori. Seneca saith well, Lex si noccitem punit, ceddendum est justitiæ; si innocentem, ceddendum est fortunæ. The medicine and remedy is, not to contend and strive, but humbly to yeild and submit. Have you given a cause, and yet take a scandall unto you? then all you can doe, is too little to make satisfaction. Is cause of scandall given unto you? yet policy, duty, and religion, enforce you to sue, yeild, and submit, to your Soveraigne, betweene whom and you there can bee no proportion of duty. When God requires it as a principall duty and service to himselfe, and when it is evident, that great good may ensue of it to your friends, your selfe, your Country, and your Soveraigne, and extreame harme by the contrary: there can be no dishonour or hurt to yeild, but in not doing of it, is dishonor & impiety.

The difficultie (my good Lord) is to conquer your selfe, which is the height of true valour and fortitude; whereunto all your honourable actions have intended. Doe it in this, and God will be pleased, her Majestie (I doubt not) well satisfied: your Country will take good, and your friends take comfort by it; and your selfe (I mention you last, for I know that of all these, you esteeme your selfe least) shall receive honour, and your enemies (if you have any) shall bee disappointed, of their bitter-sweete hopes.

I have delivered what I thinke, simply and truly; and leave you to determine according to your wisedome. If I have erred, it is Error amoris, not, Amor Erroris. Construe and accept it (I beseech you) as I meane it; not as an advise, but as an opinion, to be allowed or cancelled at your pleasure. If I might conveniently have conferred with your selfe in person, I would not have troubled you with so many idle blots. Whatsoever you judge of this mine opinion, yet be assured my desire is to further all good meanes that may tend to your good, and so wishing you all honourable happinesse, I rest your Lordships most ready and faithfull, though unable, poore friend.

The Earles Answer.

(334) My very good Lord. Though there is not the man this day living, whom I would sooner make a Iudge of any question that did concerne mee, then your selfe: yet you must give me leave to tell you, that in some cases I must appeale from all earthly judges; and if in any, then surely in this, when the highest judge on earth hath imposed upon mee the heaviest punishment without triall or hearing. Since then I must either answer your Lordships arguments, or forsake mine owne just defence, I will force mine aking head to doe mee service for an houre.

I must first deny my discouragement, which was forced to bee an humorous discontentment, and in that it was unseasonable, and is too long continuing, your Lordship should rather condole with mee, then expostulate. Naturall seasons are expected here below, but violent and unseasonable stormes come from above: there is no tempest to the passionate indignation of a Prince, nor that at any time so unreasonable, as when it lighteth on those that might expect an harvest of their painefull and carefull labours. Hee that is once wounded must feele smart till his hurt is cured, or the part senselesse; but cure I expect none, her Majesties heart being obdurate; and be without sense I cannot. But then (you say) I may ayme at end. I doe more then ayme, for I see an end of all my fortunes, and have set an end to all my desires. In this course doe I any thing for mine enemies? when I was present, I found them absolute, and therefore I had rather they should triumph alone then have mee attendant upon their Chariot. Or doe I leave my friends? when I was a Courtier, I could yeeld them no fruit of my love to them; now I am an Hermite, they shall beare no envy for their love to me. Or doe I forsake my selfe, because I doe enjoy my selfe? Or doe I overthrow my fortunes, because I build not a fortune of paper walles, which every puffe of wind blowes downe? Or doe I ruinate mine honour because I leave following the pursuit, or wearing the false marke of the shadow of honour? Doe I give courage or comfort to the forraigne enemies, because I reserve my selfe to encounter them; or because I keepe mine heart from baseneſſe, though I cannot keepe my fortune from declining? No, no, I give every one of these considerations his due right, and the more I weigh them, the more I find my selfe justified from offending in any of them. As for the two last objections, that I forsake my Countrey when it hath most need of me, and faile in that indissoluble duty which I owe to my Soveraigne: I answer, that if my Country had at this time need of my publike service, her Majesty that governes it would not have driven me to a private life.

I am tyed to my Country by two bands; one publike, to discharge carefully, faithfully, and industriously, that trust that is committed unto me; and the other private, to sacrifice for it my life and carkase which have beene nourished in it. Of the first I am free, being dismissed or disabled by her Majesty. Of the other, nothing can free mee but but death, and therefore no occasion of performance shall offer it selfe, but I will meete it halfe way. The indissoluble duety which I owe to her Majesty, is the duety of allegiance, which I will never; nor can faile in; the duty of attendance is no indissoluble duety. I owe her Majesty service of an Earle, and of a Marshall of England. I have beene contented to doe her the service of a Clerke, but can never serve her as a villaine, as a slave. But yet (you say) I must give way to time: so I doe, for now I see the storme come, I have put my selfe into the harbour. Seneca saith, we must give way to fortune. I know that fortune is blind and strong; and therefore I goe as farre out of the way as I can. You say the remedy is not to strive, I neither strive nor seeke for remedy, but I must yeeld and submit, I can never yeeld my selfe to be guilty, or this imposition lately laid upon me, to be just: I owe so much to the Author of truth, as I can never yeeld truth to be falshood, or falshood to be truth. Have I given cause (you aske) and take a scandall? No, I gave not cause to take up so much as Fimbrius his complaint, for I did totum telum corpore accipere. I patiently beare all, and sensibly feele all that I then received. When this scandall was given mee, may when the vilest of all indignities are done unto mee, doth Religion enforce me to serve? doth God require it? is it impiety not to doe it? why? cannot Princes erre? cannot subjects receive wrong? is an earthly power or authority infinite? Pardon mee, pardon mee my Lord, I can never subscribe to these principles: but Salomons foole laughes when he is stricken: Let these that meane to make their profit by Princes faults, shew to have no feare of Princes injuries. Let them acknowledge an infinite absolutenesse in earth, that doe not believe in an absolute infinitenesse in heaven. As for me, I have received wrong, I feele it, my cause is good I know it, and whatsoever come, all the powers on earth can never shew more strength and constancy in oppressing, then I can shew in suffering, whatsoever shall be imposed upon me.

Your Lordship in the beginning of your letter made your selfe a looker on, and mee a player of mine owne game; so you may see more then I: but you must give mee leave to tell you in the end of mine, that since you but see and I suffer; I must of necessity feele more then you. I must crave your Lordships patience, to give him that hath a crabbed fortune leave to use a crabbed stile. But whatsoever my stile is, there is no heart more humble, nor more affected toward your Lordship, then that of your Lordships poore friend.

R. ESSEX.

(335) The distempered humour discovering it selfe in this letter, argueth both the depth of his seeled discontent; and the danger of giving way to violent passions, which not onely deprive the wiseſt of the use of their owne understanding, but also blind their eyes that they cannot see, nor apprehend the benefit of other mens faithfull counsels. Notwithstanding, it pleased her gracious Highneſse (whom hee so censureth as wronging him, for lending a more attentive eare to his enemies suggestions, then to his owne satisfactions) first, to remit his durance to his owne house, and then loth to looke into his faults but with her Princely eye of favour to proceed unto some moderate censure of his actions, to the end hee might see his owne errors, and thee so limit his power, as her owne might be secured.

Essex commanded to his owne house.

(336) To which end thee assigned certaine of her Privy Councell to convent him concerning the breaking of his former instructions for the North-Irish prosecution, and the manner of his treating with Tir-Oen, his comming from Ireland, and leaving that Kingdome contrary to her Majesties expresse commandement, signed under her Royall Hand and Signet. Whereunto his answer was, that the state of Warre held it a Maxime, to make good the Stand before the Remove, and that it was one thing at Table to direct, but another thing in field to effect, especially in Ireland, whose warre was with Bogges and Woods, aswell as with Men. And to the rest of the objections hee answered with such obedient discretion, and loyall submission, as he well satisfied the Honourable Presence, onely a suspension from the exercise of some of his Offices was decreed, untill her Majesties pleasure should otherwise order it. Shortly after he was set at full liberty; the Queene sending him word, that thee well hoped his future guard would now be his owne discretion.

Essex suspended from the exercise of his office.

(337) But seeing his wonted greatneſſe restrained, though the scope of his liberty was thus farre enlarged, hee presently mounted higher with the wings of discontent: for deprived of Offices, neglected in Court, and all his forraigne services powred into her Majesties lap, was now (as he imagined) there wrapped up, and laid in oblivion. Neither were these his grievances lessened by his military followers, who daily watred these ill fet plants with their exasperated complaints, till they were sprung to some height; and still to nourish their sap, many projects were cast, and conferences held how to lop off other branches, which as they feared would hinder their growth; till lastly, at Drury House they agreed on the manner (O had it withered before it had blowmed, or dyed in the graffing, before it tooke sappe) which was by violent hand to bring the Earle into her Majesties presence, and to remove from her such as they deemed his opposites.

The conference at Drury house.

(338) The frequent assembly unto Essex house by Noblemen, Knights, Captaines, and others, was presently observed by the Statists in Court; to stop the currant of which confluence before it grew to a sloud, Secretary Herbert was sent from her Majesty to require him to repaire before the Lords of her Councell, then assembled at Salisbury Court, which hee excusing with sicknesse, neglected to doe, and the same night upon some sinister reports set a double watch about him, pretending some danger to bee meant to his person. For whose defence the next morning (being Sunday) many repaired unto his house, among whom, as chiefe were the Earles of Rutland and Southampton, the Lord Sands and Monteagle, accompanied with a Troupe of gallant Gentlemen their followers.

Febru. 8.

(339) Her Majesty hearing of these disorderly proceedings, in her Princely wisedome thought to cast water upon this begun fire, before it brake forth into flame, and thereupon sent foure men of much honour unto his place, to offer him justice for any grieſes, and to command the assembly to depart. The persons sent were the Lord Keeper of the Great Seale, the Earle of Worcester; Sir Francis Knowles his uncle, and the Lord Chiefe Iustice of England, all of them in high honour and favour with the Earle himselfe.

The Queene sent foure of her Councell unto the Earle of Essex

(340) These comming to his house, without Temple-Barre, were received in themselves, but scarse any of their servants suffered to follow, excepting the Bearer of the Purse and Seale, where finding the Court full of those his followers, the Lord Keeper putting off his hat, told them that they were sent by her Majesty to understand the cause of this their assembly, and to let them know, that if they had any particular cause of griefe against any person whatsoever, they should have hearing and Iustice. The Earle of Essex answered, that his life was fought after, and that hee had beene perfidiously dealt withall. To which the Lord Chiefe Iustice replyed, that if any such matter was attempted, it was fit for him to declare it, assuring him of a faithfull relation, and that her Majesty would doe him Iustice. Which promises the Lord Keeper seconded, and desired the Earle too declare his grieſes, if not openly, yet in private, and he doubted not but to procure him full satisfaction, and then turning towards the multitude, with a louder voyce, said; I doe command you all upon your allealegeance, to lay downe your Weapons, and depart. Whereupon the Earle himselfe went into his Booke-Chamber, these foure Counsellors following him in hope of private conference; but so farre off was hee from hearing them further, or answering to their demands mands, that leaving them there under sure custody, he returned to his other attendants.

(341) With whom in tumultuous manner, hee made into London, his followers crying, that the Earle of Essex should have beene murthered by Cobham, Cecill, and Raughley, all men amased what this did meane. Thus past he from Ludgate through Cheapeside, into Fan-Church-street, where he entred the house of a * supposed friend (then one of the Shiriffes) who seeing the multitude, avoyded himselfe out at a backe-dore, when presently in divers parts of the City, Essex was proclaimed a Traytor, to the no lesse griefe of the Citizens, then feares of his followers, and thence returning with a Halbert in his hand, and a table-napkin about his necke, came into Gracious-street, where a while hee made his stand, (the Lord Maior and others being assembled at the upper end towards Leaden Hall) no one Citizen or servant shewing him any signe of assistance. The case so desperate, one of the principall offenders contrived how by redeeming his fault, to save his owne life; who hastening into the Strand to Essex house, and comming to Sir John Davis, as being sent from the Earle, gat release of the foure Counsellors, under whose guard they had beene hitherto kept.

Thom. Smith.

Hee returneth and is forced from Ludgate.

(342) Essex now despairing of all succours in London, saw it was bootelesse there to make his abode, and therefore retired againe towards Pauls; meaning to passe Ludgate the way that hee came, but being resisted by a company of Pikemen, and other forces, made by that stout and noble Prelate, the then Lord Bishop of London, hee was put backe, Sir Christopher Blunt sore hurt, and young Tracy slaine; besides some others on the Queenes part, himselfe narrowly escaping, being thrust through the hat with a pyke. So hence againe returning, at Queene Hive hee tooke boate, bidding the City and his fortunes adue.

Taketh boate and fortifieth his house in Strand.

(343) His enterprise thus frustrate, with a mind distracted hee rowed up the river, and landed at the Water-gate of his owne house, which hee presently fortified; and the Lord Admirall assaulted, suffering notwithstanding the Countesse of Essex, the Lady Rich, and their Gentlewomen to depart, which done, hee forced the Garden even to the Walles of the House. Some resistance was made, and some persons slaine upon either part, which the Earle perceiving, presently yeilded, desiring onely that he might bee civilly used, and that hee might have an honourable triall; and so being first brought to Lambeth-house where an houre or two he remained with the Lord Archbishop (his ever most loving, but then most mournefull friend) was thence with some other Lords and Gentlemen convayed by water to the Tower, about ten of the clocke the same night: having then experience, that vaine is the love of the Commons to a Subject (how great soever) wherein it is counterballanced with the dutifull obedience unto their Prince.

Essex arraigned and condemned.

(344) Vpon the nineteenth of the same moneth, the Earle of Essex and Southampton were arraigned at Westminster, the Lord Buckhurst Lord high Treasurer of England, being made Lord Steward for the day, where the great resolution of the one, contemning death, and the sweet temper of the other well deserving life, did breed most compassionate affections in all men, hearing the sentence of Law to passe upon them. The one of them remained prisoner in the Tower during the raigne of the Queene, and by the gracious clemency of our Soveraigne Lord King Iames at his comming to the Crowne, had pardon of life, and restauration of blood, the other (Essex) the five and twentieth of February, being Ashwednesday, suffered upon the Greene within the Tower, rendring his soule to God with a most penitent and Christian constancy, whose last speeches were to this effect.

Is Executed.

His speech at death.

(345) "My Lords and Christian brethren, who "are present witnesses of my just punishment, I "confesse (to Gods Glory) my selfe a most wret-"ched sinner, and that my sinnes in number ex-"ceed the haires of my head; that good which I "would have done, that did I not, and the evill "which I would not, that did I. For all which I "beseech my Saviour Christ to bee a Mediator to "his Father my God, especially for this my last "sinne, this great, this crying, this bloudy, this "infectious sinne, wherein, through love of mee, "so many have beene drawne to offend God, their "Soveraigne, and the world. I beseech God, her "Majesty, and the State, to forgive us; and I be-"seech him to blesse her with a prosperous raigne, "with a wise and understanding heart, to blesse the "Nobles and Ministers of the Church and State. "I likewise beseech you, and all the world, to hold "a charitable opinion of mee, for my intention "towards her Majesty, whose death (I protest) "I never meant, nor any violence towards her Per-"son. I thanke God, I never was Atheist, in not "beleeving the Scriptures: neither Papist, trusting "in my owne merits; but am assured to bee saved "by the mercies and merits of Christ Iesus my "Saviour. This faith I was brought up in, and "heerein I am now ready to dye; beseeching you "all to joyne your soules with mee in prayer, that "my soule may bee lifted up by faith, above all "earthly things; and first I desire forgiveneſſe of "all the world, even as freely, as from my heart I "forgive all the world.

(346) And then kneeling downe, said, I have beene divers times in places of danger, where death was neither so present nor so certaine, and yet even then I felt the weakneſſe of my flesh, and therefore now in this last and great conflict, I desire Gods assistance by his preserving Spirit. And so with * a most heavenly prayer, and faithfull constancy, (as if his soule were then already in heavenly fruition) hee humbled himselfe to the blocke, and spreading abroad his armes (the signe that hee had given to his heads-man) his head was with three strokes of the Axe severed from his body, the great heavineſſe of all men, appearing as well by their countenances, as spleene against his Executioner, who was in danger of his life at his returne, had not the Sheriffes assisted him to his home.

* See this his prayer and other his speeches at large in Stowes Annals page 1406.

(347) For accessaries and chiefe Counsellors in this offence, dyed at Tyburne, Sir Gilliam Merricke Knight, and Henry Cuffe (for his exquisite learning much bewailed of all men) and five dayes after them, upon the Scaffold on Tower Hill, were beheaded Sir Charles Davers and Sir Christopher Blunt Knights. And before any of these, Thomas Lee a Captaine was executed, for words spoken touching the Earle of Essex his deliverance, to move, or rather to inforce the Queene thereunto, as his words were construed who nevertheleſſe confidently tooke his death, that hee never had thought of any violent attempt.

Her Military providence.

Others executed.

(348) As the death of this Noble-man was much lamented by the subjects, (whose love towards him was so ingrafted, as I thinke, I may well say, never subject had more) so her Majesty likewise having such a Starre falne from her firmament, was inwardly mooved, and outwardly oftentimes would shew passions of her griefe, even till the time of her approaching end, when two yeeres after hee laid downe her Head in the Grave, as the most resplendent Sunne setteth at last in a Westerne cloud.

The griefe conceived for the Earle of Essex his death.

(349) The state of which Great Queene throughout the whole course of her most flourishing raigne, was (as in part you have seene shadowed already) so beautified and strengthened with all honourable perfections, both of Peace, and Warre, as never any Monarch raigned with greater observance of her owne, nor ruled with a more observed magnanimity toward forraigne Nations: insomuch, as if her incomparable vertues and praises were truly and exactly described (a worke worthy some noble spirit and penne) wee are verily perswaded, that future ages will somewhat stagger and doubt, whether such celebration celebration of her, were not rather affectionately Poeticall, then faithfully Historicall.

Her sway and estimation in forraigne Countries.

(350) For, the great affaires of Europe mainely depended upon her directions, who sitting at the Helme of the Ship (as Fronto spake of Antoninus the Emperour) arbitrated and guided their estates both in peace and warre: Spaine, seeking to overthrow all, was beaten backe, and scarcely able to maintaine her owne bankes: In France, the house of Valoyes underpropped by her counsell; that of Bourbons, advanced by her countenance, forces, and treasure; Scotland releived by her love; Netherlands by her power; Portugals King by her bounty, Poland by her commiseration; likewise Germany, Denmarke, Suetheland, often tooke up and laid downe Armes at her becke and disposse. Neither could the utmost bounds of Europe, (the Russians and Tartars) containe the limits and extent of her great fame; but that the same pierced further into the remoter parts of Asia, Affrica, Amecira, among the Turkes, (whose great Emperour, in honour of so great a Mediatresse, granted peace unto the Polonians out-worne with warres,) among the Persians, Barbarians, Indians, and where not? In most of whose Dominions to the great enriching of her Kingdome, shee setled commerce for encrease of merchandize, and got large privileges for encouragement of her Merchants, whom shee cherished as a most necessary and important part of her Weale-Publike.

Her princely qualities.

(351) Who, for her royall actions and Princely qualities of Minde (seated also in such a Body as for state, stature, beauty, and Majesty, best befitted an Empresse,) may bee singled out for an Idea of an absolute Prince, her Sex onely excepted, which yet made her vertues more remarkeable, as being (and so reputed by Strangers) of all the Princes of her time, the most exact observer (both for Action and Ceremony,) of true Regall deportment and magnificence. For her enterprizes as fortunate as Cæsar, for life, love, wisedome, and magnanimity, another Augustus; by her peaceable raigne shutting the Temple of Warre in England (whiles all Nations round about her felt the miseries of warre) as hee did the doores of Ianus of Rome. And yet had thee Warriours like unto the Worthies of Dawid, her forraigne imployments. Navigations, and discoveries, having bred such numbers of most renowned Captaines, both for Sea and Land, as none of our former Princes have seene the like. With which necessary kinde of noble Servitors, that her owne Kingdome might bee alwayes munified (as foreseeing the uncertainties and sudden changes in the Peace pretending amities of forraigne Princes,) shee ever imployed many of her Gentry and others, in the warres of Princes abroad, so to perfect them for all occurrencies of their Country at home; which also induced her (some Statists have thought) to suffer that long lingring protraction of her Irish warres, the rather, to keepe in ure and exercise, the skill and valour of her English. By which meanes, the spreading fame and * extent of her Empire was such, that shee might seeme a second Traian, who laid the circuite of the Romans the largest; having not only so powerfull a Navy still in readinesse, as whereby she attained the Soveraignty of the Sea, but so famous Sea-men also, as that, under her auspicious Raigne, * twice was the whole Globe of the Terrestriall World sailed round about.

(352) Neither lesse was her renowne for those other vertues which are the attendants of Peace; her Clemency, Iustice, and * Temperance: touching the last of which, as in one kind (of her dyet and private life,) King Edward her brother usually called her, his Lady Temper: so of another kind of Temperance in this learnedst of Queenes, the * learnedst of Kings hath given this memorable testimony, that when as France (part of her Royall Title) was in civill warres, Spaine (her mortall Enemy) enfeebled both in power and purse, Netherland ambitious of her governement, and Scotland ruled by an Infant, yet in such abundance both of meanes, opportunities, and provocations, so superabundant was her moderation and temper, that shee ever religiously abstained from all ambitious defire of encrochment on the rights or territories of any her neighbour Princes. Being in this, and those other her vertuous actions, such as of whom that which was spoken of Antoninus Pius, may more truly bee verified, that scarcely, in youth shee did any thing rashly, or in her age indiscreetly; scarcely, I say: for as a Creature, Woman, from passions, or as a Prince, from all errors, wherein no, even against her owne naturall inclination, shee might bee drawne, either on mistinformation, or on opinion of necessity in the State: For her Court, it was not onely a frequent Academie, of as Honourable Councellors, Illustrious Peeres, Gallant Courtiers, Learned Professors, Intelligent Statists, as ever attended any Christian Prince, but also a Nurſery, where young Nobles and others might bee trained up to the managing of greatest affaires, and a Sanctuary where the meanest might finde releefe against the mightiest; because as the Wisest in her Councell were content to learne wisedome from her directions, so the Greatest were drawne to practise Equity, both by her example and command. Yea, which is more admirable in her Sex, so reserved was shee from giving any man too-much interrest, or bebout her, that they all stood in a reverent awe of her very presence and aspect; but much more of her least frowne or checke, wherewith some of them who thought they might best presume of her favour, have beene so suddenly daunted and Planet-stricken, that they could not lay downe their griefe thereof, but in their graves. A thing so much the stranger, considering otherwile her incomparable meeknesse, and gracious countenance and demeanours towards her people, who never satiated with her sight and presence, were no otherwise affected with joy and wondering thereat, (though they beheld her never so often) then if they had beheld some Angelicall Creature.

(353) These Soveraigne Arts of Majesticall rule, were marvellously polished and perfected by her exquisite learning, and insight in the Arts Liberall: for which if the Emperour Hadrian bee so highly commended, much more must this learned Empresse, who further to perfect her solid knowledge, read every Authour in his owne Originall, and answered most Nations Ambassadours in their owne languages. Yea, so farre was shee devoted to learning and the professors thereof, that in honour of it and them, shee purposely went to the Vniversity of Oxford twice, and once to Cambridge, at each time there spending many whole dayes together, at the Academicall Exercises, and disputations of their chiefest learned men in all faculties. In both which noble Academies, shee left not onely the deare remembrances of her gracious love, delivered to them publikely in her Princely and Eloquent Orations, but much more testified in her Princely bounty, by enacting a Law for the doubling (almost) of the yeerely revenewes of all their noble foundations. Thus spent shee her time and cares in cherishing wisedome in others, and like Sabaes Queene seeking to increase it in her selfe, esteeming a day spent otherwise (as Titus was wont to say of himselfe) quite lost. For which purpose every day all other affaires laide aside, these set apart some howres, either to reade, or heare her learned Readers; one of which number, (a * man of excellent learning) professed, that her Instructers as oft as they came to her presence about such employments, received such admirable documents from her, that they seemed rather to learne of her, then to bring learning to her; and that the learnedst Authors, as Divine Plato, and the like, were made more divine by the learned Commentaries which shee wrote upon them. In which respects, both of noble actions and arts, well may shee be paralelled with that ever-renowned Zenobia, who having both perfectly read the Roman Story in Greeke and also her selfe abridged the Alexandrian, and all the Orientall history, thereby attained to so high a pitch of wisdome and authority, that shee not onely insulted upon the Romans, but held the Arabians, Sarazens, Armenians, and other fierce and intractable people in such obedience, that they never durst stirre against her.

Her Piety.

(354) But amongst her volumes (which were very many and choiseft) the Booke of God was first in her esteeme, nor last in her readings; the pious fruits whereof shined brightly throughout the whole course aswell of her private life, as publike actions. In her Private; Piety, Sobriety, Purity, Charity, and Chastity (maugre the venemous tongues of all Hellborne Slanderers) were her unseparable Companions, never suffering any Lady to approach her sacred presence, of whose staine she had but the least suspition. For the Publike, the distressed shee releived, the oppressed shee succoured, the over-borne Princes shee ayded, the proud shee amated, and alwayes overmastered to her lasting memory, and Englands glory. But most especially shined her zeale to God (on whose onely Providence and reflexe of her owne unstained Conscience, shee reposed against all affronts of the world) in preserving his true Church and worship, both from the pollutions of Idolatry, and frenzies of Novelists; her Kingdome being a receptacle, and Court a Sanctuary for the banished Protestants, as was the Pallace of Constantine (the husband of our Helena) for the persecuted Christians, when he sate Emperour of the West in this Iland of Britaine. Whereby as in her life time shee attained to bee *stiled by forraine Churches; so at her death was shee by them generally lamented, as the Nursing mother of the French, Dutch, Italian, Exiles for Christs name, and the uncanquered Defendaresse of the whole the Christian Religion.

(355) Thus shee lived, raigned, and dyed in Peace, and full of glory, celebrated by the tongues and pennes of the rarest spirits of all Nations (yea even enemies) of her time: till lastly the God of Peace called her to a farre higher glory, by his unpartiall messenger death, who seized on her at her Manour of Richmond. Her sickenesse was accompanied with a deepe melancholy, wherein, as shee gave signes of death unto the learned Physitians, so great assurance of her eternall life, unto all the worthy Prelates employed about her: manifesting (even when silence oppressed her tongue) by lively signes at their prayers and speeches, how she rejoyced with the Apostle, that shee had fought a good fight, finished her course, and kept the faith, hoping for the Crowne of righteousnesse, that the Lord the righteous Iudge had laid up for her against that great day. And so her soule departed this fleth (the earthen vessell wherein so many heavenly endowments had been treasured) being borne up by the Angels unto the fruitions of endlesse blisse, the twenty fourth of March, the yeere of Salvation 1602, of her owne age, sixty nine, sixe moneths, and seventeene dayes, and of her glorious Raigne the forty fourth yeere, foure moneths, and seven dayes; as well beloved and as much lamented as ever was Prince; admired, favoured, and feared as the worlds wonder and heavens darling: being the last in order of those Monarchs who had long raigned over the South part of this Iland, and the greatest in fame that ever ruled before her, as if all their vertues had made a confluence in her, that so glorious a Monarchy might not have end, but with so glorious a period.

THE TENTH BOOKE.

An. Dom. 1602.

BEFORE the conceived forrowes, for the death of the late renowned Queene, could fully be dissolved into teares, or those get passage from the heart to the eyes, the conduit was stopped with a sudden joy, and all faces cleared, before that sad pensiveneſſe had therein set her full print. The state of England standing that day, like unto that of Iudah, wherein the foundation of the second Temple was laid, whose ancient men mourned, as doubting the glory thereof could not be answerable to that of Salomons; but as they were comforted by a Prophet from GOD, That the glory of the later should surmount the former, so all English hearts by a divine blessing from GOD, were presently cheered, when they saw their Morning Starre arise in the North, whose Pole with His attractive Power, long long before had drawne the Needle of the Southerne Compasse unto that one point.

March 24.

(2) Immediately upon the death of the Queene, the Lords of the Land gave full satisfaction unto the people, in proclaiming IAMES the Sixt, King of Scotland, by the name of Iames the First, King of England, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c. to the unspeakeable comfort of all true English, as well for his unquestionable claime, as for that hee professed the same true Religion (whose preservation was their tender care) as also for his singular learning and experience, whereby hee was accomplished to undergoe the managing of so great an Empire, having now attained to thirty sixe yeeres, nine moneths, and five dayes, exercised altogether in the practise of Kingly governement, from the very first dayes of his infancy.

King Iames proclaimed.

King Iames his just title to the Crowne of England.

(3) That his Title was most just, no man can deny, being sprung from the united Roses of Lancaster and Torke, King Henry the seventh, and Queene Elizabeth his Wife: whose Issue by the Male, failing in the late deceased Queene Elizabeth of glorious memory, the off-spring of Margaret their eldest daughter, was the next Heire, which Lady married unto Iames, the fourth King of Scotland; by him had issue King Iames the fifth, whose onely Daughter Queene Mary was Mother of this our mighty Monarch. Let Doleman therefore dote upon his owne dreames, and other like Traytors fashion their barres upon the Popes forge; yet hath God and his right set him on the Throne of his most lawfull inheritance, so to unite the two Crownes into one: Gods omnipotent arme bringing at last that to passe, which had often beene assayed, but could not bee effected by any power of man. For, did not Edward our first, the terror of Syria, and Edward the sixt, our godly Iosias, both of them distresse Scotland with their warres; onely to have made an union by the marriages of their next Heires. But the time being not come, and all other preceeding Princes failing of their purposes, the peaceable union of those two Kingdomes, England and Scotland, as also of two other, France and Ireland, was referved for Him, who is a patterne of all Princely Learning and Piety, unto all other Monarchs upon the furface of the Earth.

King Iames appointed by God to unite the two Kingdoms.

(4) But these calme proceedings without any oppugnancy, as they were most joyfull to the English, so were they admirable unto other forraigne Nations, yea, and envyed at of some, especially such as hoped for an alteration, or at least-wise a toleration of Religion. And so much the rather, for that Pope Clement the eight, had sent the yeere before unto Henry Garnet, Superior of the Iesuites in England, two Bulles to the contrary; one to the Clergy, and the other to the Laity. The Title of the former was, Dilectis filiis Archipresbytero, & reliquo Clero Anglicano, &c. the latter, Dilectis filiis, Principibus, & Nobilibus, Catholicis Anglicanis, salutem & Apostolicam Benedictionem: the summe of both, thus. To our beloved sonnes, the Arch-Priest and the Clergy, the Peeres and Nobles, Catholikes of England, greeting, and Apostolicall Benediction, &c. The tenour was, that after the death of her Majesty, whether by course of Nature, or otherwise: Whosoever should lay claime or title to the Crowne of England, though never so directly, and neerely interessed by discent, should not be admitted unto the Throne; unlesse he would first tolerate the Romish Religion, and by all his best endeavours promote the Catholike cause, unto which, by a solemne and sacred Oath, he should religiously subscribe, after the death of that Miserable Woman: for so it pleased his Holinesse to terme Elizabeth, that most great and happy Queene. By vertue of which Bule, (if vertue may bee in any such vicious Libels) the Iesuites disswaded the Romish-minded Subjects from yeelding (in any wise) obedience unto King Iames, as being not an obedient Catholike sonne; but this not working to their wished effect, and Hee now solemnely proclaimed with an universall applause, love, and peace, their hopes began to grow cold, and no succours from Spaine being now to be expected, Garnet, the Superiour, to avoyde further dangers, sacrificed these hunger-starved Buls to Vulcan the fiery god.

(5) King Iames in Scotland, receiving intelligence of the most plausible passages to this enlargement of his Stile and Dominions, prepared himselfe hitherward, and upon the first of April came to Barwicke, thence to Wytherington, Newcastle, Durham, Torke, Doncaster, Newarke, Burleigh, Roiston, Theobalds, and thence to London upon the seventh of May. In all which places hee was most royally and joyously received, with all demonstrations of truest loyalty, love, and obedience, which was no lesse benignely accepted of by his Majesty, who the better to manifest his royall disposition, in all such places as hee came, where Gaoyles for offenders were kept, out of his clemency most graciously set free the Prisoners, (those onely excepted, who lay for treason, murther, or Romish disloyalty) disbursing also large summes of money for release of many others from their creditors.

An. Dom. 1603. King Iames commeth to London.

His Mercy extended to the Prisoners.

(6) In all which progresse, admirable was the confluence of people, which with haste to meete him, seemed rather to flye then to runne, and such were their shoutes of joy, that the hils resounded the Ecchо thereof, even up to the Heavens, which had beene so propitious, as to bestow on them so good a King, which most abundantly appeared the day that his Majesty removed from Theobalds to London, when at Stanford-hill, neere unto Tottnam high-Crosse in Middlesex, the City of London (represented in the Lord Maior, the Aldermen, with five hundred choyce Citizens, all in Chaines of gold, and very well mounted) met his Majesty, and with all solemne observance attended Him unto the Charter-House neere Smithfield, which was most sumptuously furnished for his royall entertainement. On which very day, a Proclamation came forth against all griping Monopolies that hindered commerce, and Protections that stopped the due proceedings of Law, as also against other abuses in other inferiour carriages. All which were so acceptable to the People and Common-wealth, (which had beene too much eaten-out with such Locusts and Caterpillers) as never any King wanne himselfe more love: these being accepted as the auspicious beginnings, promising most happy sequels. So that His entrance was as another Constantine, whose person every man prayed for, and desired to see: and for peace, another Octavius, having ruled peaceably a stout stirring Nation, even from his yonger yeeres, and lived in peace with all the Princes and Kings of the Earth: in which peace now lastly hee brought the Crowne, and Kingdome of Scotland to augment the glory, circuit and strength of this Realme of England, in whose united body, as a faire branched Tree, even at the first hee began to engraft the Scyences of his Princely vertues, which by the sappe and Sunne-shine of his just governement still spread more and more, like unto the Cedars that grow upon Lebanon.

His Majesties coming to London.

His Majesties first proceedings to maintaine law and commerce.

(7) The English Empire thus peaceably established, both by, and unto this peaceable Monarch: from sundry forraigne Princes were sent Ambassadors, to congratulate his entrance; as namely, from the Palsgrave of the Rheine, one of the Princes Electors for the Emperour of the Romans: from the French King Monsieur de Rosny, Great Treasurer of France: from the Spanish King, Don Iohn de Taſsis: from the States of Holland and Zeland: from the Arch-Duke of Austria: from the Signiory of Venice: from the Duke of Florence, and from others.

Divers Ambassadors came into England to congratulate his entrance.

(8) But among all new-commers, none was more admired, nor gazed on, then was Hugh Oneal, Earle of Tir-Oen, that perfidious, (but very valiant) subtile, and smooth tongued Traytor, and Bontefeu of Ireland, that had beene the death of many a worthy man: who having (as wee have shewed) yeelded himselfe to the Lord Generall Mountjoy, in the sickenesse of the late Queene, was now by him brought unto Englands Court, to the Generals great honour, and Tir-Owens great good, if hee could have had grace to containe himselfe. For not onely was hee taken upon his lowly submission into favour with his dread Soveraigne, and restored to his former estate and dignity, (a very great favour to so great an offender) but a Proclamation was also made in his behalfe, and for his security, that hee should of all men bee honourably used, (a grace seldome shewed a Traytor) because as it seemed, his guilty conscience surcharged with bloud, feared the hand of every man that beheld his face; and indeed many Women enraged for losse of their Husbands, and Sonnes, furiously desired and assayed to quench their hatred with his bloud: in which perplexity wee will leave him for a restlesse Rebell, who lastly like a fugitive left againe both his loyalty, and his owne Countrey.

Tir-Oen brought into England.

Much gazed at.

And hated.

Trophies set up in London stood long unfinished

(9) In the meane while the solemnities for the Coronation were prepared, and many stately Trophies (no lesse due to the conservation of Peace, then to the atchievings of Warre) in London streets set up, which by reason of the great sickenesse in that City then cruelly raging, stood a long time rather like the ruines of some old decay, then the Princely Pageants of a new Triumph. For before the appointed day of Coronation (which was the twenty fifth of July, being the Feast day of Saint Iames the Apostle) a Proclamation came forth, that no Londoner should presume to approach to the Court, the City having buried that weeke above a thousand of the plague. But yet a greater plague to the Land then this, was intended some weekes before, had not the providence of a good GOD prevented the designes of mercilesse men. For, certaine Italianated Priests, boyling in revengefull rancor, because their plots and hopes (which they vainely promised themselves for advancement of their Religion) were now past all appearance of possibility or successe, and combining with some other of better Ranke and Note, whom private discontents had wheeled on to a publike mischiefe; contrived together a desperate designe, for surprize of the Kings Person, and Prince Henry his Soane. Of forces to effect it, they made no doubt, meaning to retaine them prisoners in the Tower, and with the Treasures therein to maintaine their intent, or, if the Tower were impugnable, then to carry them to Dover Castle, and there by violence either to obtaine their owne pardons, a toleration in Religion, and a removall of some Counsellors of the State, or else to put some further project in execution. To conceale this Treason, Watson the Priest devised Oaths for secrecy, and himselfe with Clarke (another Priest also) taught, that the act was lawfull, being done before the Coronation, for that the King was no King, before hee was Annointed, and the Crowne solemnely set on his head.

Conspiracies intended and revealed.

John Stow.

The intents of the Conspirators.

A Doctrine well fitting such Doctors.

(10) The other persons whose loyalty was likewise called into question, as involued in the attempt, were Henry Brooke, Lord Cobham, and Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, Thomas Lord Gray of Wilton, Sir Walter Rawley, Lord Warden of the Stanneries, Sir Griffin Markham, and Sir Edward Parham Knights, George Brooke, and Bartholmew Brooksby Esquires, and Anthony Copley, a Gentleman; all which parties being apprehended, were committed some to the Gate-House at Westminster, others to the Tower of London. Meane while (notwithstanding the raging sickenesse) the day for the Coronation (being the Feast of Saint Iames) was celebriously kept, with all solemne performance, and ancient Rites of the English Kings, in the Collegiate Church of Saint Peter in Westminster. Where, the antique Regall Chaire of Inthronation, did blessedly receive, with the Person of His Majesty, the full accomplishment also of that Propheticall prediction of the His comming to the Crowne, which Antiquity hath recorded to have beene therein inscribed thus.

The Coronation of the King and Queene.

July 25.

The Regall chaire brought out of Scotland, wherein is a stone called Saxum Fatale, said to be of high esteeme with the Scots.

Ni fallat Fatum Scoti hunc quocunq; locatum Invenient Lapidem, regnare tenentur ibidem.

If Fates goe right, this Stone, where e're tis pight.
The Scot shall find, and there his Raigne assight.

For even there now the sacred Oyle was powred upon the Royall Persons of King Iames and Queene Anne, by the most Reverend Prelate, Iohn Whitgift, Lord Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, the Princesse and Peeres wearing their Robes and Coronets, the Officers giving attendance in their places, and the Lord Maior of London in a Gowne of Crimson Velvet, with the Aldermen in Scarlet: twelve principall Citizens were admitted to attend them, all other forbidden because of the plague.

(11) As the great solitude of the City of London by reason of this infection, and the retirednesse both of His Majesty and all His Nobles, gave some hopes to the fore-mentioned Priests and their Abettors, for the easier accomplishing their plots: so was it also some occasion of the delay of Iustice on them, after their treasonous designes were now fully brought to light. Wherefore, London continuing still unfit for such a tryall, and requisite concourse of Peeres and people, Winchester, the Terme being there kept, was the place designed for their arraignement, whether they were all conveyed under strong guard. The first who there * came to their tryall, were George Brooke, Brother to the Lord Cobham, Sir Griffith Markham, and Sir Edward Parham, Brooksby, Copley, Watson, and Clarke; whose inditement was, that they had conspired; first, to destroy the King; secondly, to raise Rebellion; thirdly, to alter Religion; fourthly, to subvert the State; and lastly, to procure forraigne Invasion. That these their intents they had made knowne unto the Lord Gray, whom they meant should have beene Earle Marshall of England, Watson Lord Chancellor, George Brooke Lord Treasurer, and Sir Griffin Markham Secretary. That with the King, the Lords also should bee surprized in their Chambers at Greenewich, and the Lord Maior and Aldermen of London should be sent for, and so be shut up in the Tower.

The Conspirators conveyed to Winchester.

Their inditements and condemnations.

(12) George Brooke hereunto answered (with a colour and pretext as lewd as the attempt) that hee had Commission from the King to doe what hee did, onely to try faithfull Subjects; which commission hee could not produce. Sir Griffin Markham (excepting onely the imputation of bloud) confessed his offence very penitently, alleadging it was through a discontented mind, and desired the Lords to bee a meane to the King for mercy. Watson and Clarke (the former of which confessed hee had drawne all those Gentlemen into these plots) did plainely and ignorantly averre, that they held the King no King, untill hee was Crowned; and that therefore it could not bee Treason: alleadging, that Saul was not King, untill hee was chosen in Mizpeh, though hee had beene Annointed in Ramah by Samuel the Prophet; neither Ieroboam, who in the dayes of Salomon, had beene confirmed by the Prophet to raigne over Israel, untill the people made him King upon the foolish answers of Rehoboam. Thus these great Rabbies made no difference betwixt the mediate and ordinary succession of lawfull Princes, ordained by God to be his Vice-gerents in fully established Common-weales, and those Kings which himselfe extraordinarily advanced, and erected to bee the whips in his hand; as the first manifestly prooved, when they had cast off Samuel, and the latter allotted to no other end, as by the Prophet is apparant, where God to him saith, I gave them a King in mine anger, and I tooke tooke him away in my wrath; but the more learned enformed them, that in England is no Inter-regnum, because the King never dieth, and that the Coronation is but a Ceremony to shew the King to the people.

November 17.

Sir Walter Rawley arraigned and condemned.

(13) Two dayes after was Sir Walter Raughley brought to the Barre, being indited for combining with the Lord Cobham (his accuser) in the foresaid designes. Whereunto he pleaded not guiltie, and so stood for his purgation, as he held argument from morning till night, to the hearers no little admiration, that a man of so exquisite understanding and experience should give consent unto such a plot, no lesse foule, then foolish. Yet in fine hee was found guiltie, and had sentence of death.

The Lords Cobham and Gray arraigned and condemned.

(14) The like judgement, a few dayes after, passed upon the Lords, Cobham, and Gray, arraigned on two severall dayes. The former being indited, for combining with Sir Walter Raughley and George Brooke, to procure forces from the King of Spaine, and the Arch-Duke, for an Invasion, &c. the other for joyning with the foresaid Priests, Knights, and Gentlemen, in their fore-mentioned conspiracies. The Lord Chancellor of England, being Lord Steward for that service, sate under a Cloth of Estate in the upper end of the Hall, the Nobles sitting (as their Peeres, and Iudges) on benches upon both sides. Those at the Barre he willed to be bold, and to answer without feare: the Kings learned Councell he intreated not to confound the memory of the prisoners with unnecessary matters: and the Peeres, though unsworne, hee advised to try indifferently betwixt the King and the arraigned; who both pleading not guilty, were yet found otherwise by the Court, and received judgement of death.

(15) Of all these arraigned, Sir Edward Parham only was acquitted by the Iury, and of all the rest onely three died, which were Watson, Clarke, and Master George Brooke: the first of which, having at large laid open in Print, the Treasons and unsufferable machinations of the Iesuiticall Order, left this suspition on them at his death, that they, in revenge, had cunningly and coverly drawne him into this Action, which brought him to this shamefull end. After whose death, his Majestie then at Wilton, (having commanded his Lords, to deliver the true narration unto him of the whole proceeding in the arraignments, and answers of all the rest) signed also a Warrant for the execution of the Lords, Cobham, and Gray, as also Markham, to be performed the Friday following before ten of the clocke in the morning. Notwithstanding his Majesty more moved to milde mercy, then the high straine of Iustice, of his Princely and free clemencie, gave life unto those persons, expecting present Death, and thus with his owne hand wrote to counter-checke his former Warrant.

The Kings Letters for stay of the Execution.

(16) Although it be true, that all well governid and flourishing Kingdomes and Common wealths aire established by Iustice, and that these two Noblemen by birth, that aire now upon the point of execution, aire for their treasonable practises condemnid by the Law, and adiudgit worthy of the execution thaireof, to the exemple and terror of otheris: The one of thaim having filthily practisced the overthrow of the quhole Kingdome, and the other for the surprise of our owin Persone: yet inregaird that this is the first yere of our Raigne in this Kingdome, and that never King was so farre obleishid to his People as we have beene to this, by our entry here with so hairty and generall an applause of all sorts. Among quhom all the kinne, friendis, and allies of the saidis condemnid persons, vaire as forduvrt, and duitifull as any other our good Subjectis, as also that at the very time of thair Arrainement none did more freely and readily give thair assent to their conviction, and to deliver thaim into the handis of Iustice, then so many of thair nereest Kinsmen and Allies (as beeing Petris) vaire upon thair Iury; as likewaise in regard that Iustice hath in some sort gottin course alreadi, by the execution of the tuo Priestis, and George Brooke, that waive the principall plottars and instigators of all the rest, to the embracing of the saidis treasonabill Machinations, wee therefore (being resolved to mixe Clemency with Iustice) aire contented, and by these Presentis command you, our present Sheriffe of Hampshire to superseid the Execution of the saidis tuo Noblemen and to take thaim backe to thair prison againe, quhile our further pleasure bee knowin. And since wee will not have our Lawis to have respect of persons in sparing the great, and strikking the meanor sort; It is our pleasure; that the like course be also taken with Marckham, being sorry from our hairt, that such is, not onely the heynous nature of the saidis condemnid persons crime, but even the corruption is so great of thair naturall disposition, as the care we have for the safety and quiet of our State and good Subjectis, will not permit us to use that Clemency towardis thaim, quhich in our owin naturall inclination, wee michi verry easilly be perswadid unto.

(17) This Letter thus framed, the delivery thereof his Majesty committed unto one Iohn Gibb a Scottish Gentleman, a discreet person, and free from dependancy of any Noble man or Counsellor, neither was he of any extraordinary ranke, as well that the by-standers should not observe any alteration for the execution, as the delinquents themselves take any apprehension by his presence, to the end that each of them severally should prepare to breathe out their last breath, with a true confession of their secret conficiences. The time approaching, Sir Griffin Markham brought to the Scaffold, (to that end erected on the Castle Greene) made himselfe ready for the stroake of the Axe, when secretly Master Gibb delivered unto the high * Sheriffe of the Shire the Kings Warrant to the contrary, who soone perceiving his Majesties intent rooke backe the prisoner, (as if he were first to confront the two Lords in the Hall upon some service to the King,) from the Scaffold, and brought him into the Castle Hall. Then was the Lord Gray brought forth, who having powred out his prayers unto God, at length kneeling downe for the stroke of death, the Sheriffe bad stay, telling the Lord that some further service was expected of him, and thereupon likewise led him againe into the Castle. The Lord Cobham then was brought to the Scaffold, who being in prayers and preparation for death, the Lord Gray and Sir Griffin were brought backe againe, where the prisoners all three appearing together on the Scaffold, the Sheriffe notified his Majesties Warrant for the stay of their Executions, and that as then they should not dye. Upon which rare Clemency, unexpected both of prisoners and spectators, arose such shouts of the people as was wonderfull, crying God save the King, and the condemned overcome with his Clemency, wished they might sacrifice their lives to redeeme their owne faults, and to repurchase so mereifull a Princes love.

* Sir Iohn Tichborne.

Sir Griffin Markham returned from the Scaffold.

The Lord Cobham, Lord Gray and Sir Griffin Markham reprived.

(18) This businesse thus transacted, for the safety of the Kings Person and whole Kingdome; his Majesty, (who well considered, that the quiet of a Weale-Publike cannot possibly subsist long, without the peace and well managed government of the Church,) having among many other Petitions which were presented to Him at his first entrance, received one from certaine persons of over zealous spirits, against the established Government and Liturgy in the English Church, resolved now by his Princely judgement, as another Hezekiah to breake the Brazen Serpent, if Idolatry were thereinto committed, and like a second Iosiah, to reade the law of the Lord himselfe: whereupon by Proclamation hee commanded an assembly of selected Divines, such as could best deliver the minds of both parts, to appeare in his Royall presence, at his Mannor of Hampton-Court: whither the summoned accordingly repaired. For the maintained Churchstate, where the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishops of London, Durham, Winchester, Worcester, Saint Davids, Chichester, Carlisl and Peterborow: the Deanes of the Chappell

2 King. 24.

A Proclamation for a conference to bee held at Hampton Court.

* On Thursday Ianuary 15.

The persons commanded.

Christs

Christs-Church, Worcester, Westminster, Paules, Chester, and Windsor, with Doctor Field, and Doctor King, the now Lord Bishop of London. To deliver the Plaintiffes desires, were summoned, and appeared Doctor Reynolds, and Doctor Sparkes of Oxford, M. Knewstubs, and M. Chaderton of Cambridge.

(19) The first sitting was upon Saturday, the foureteenth of Ianuary, in his Majesties Privy-Chamber at Hampton-Court, whereinto the Church-Governours onely being admitted (by his Majesties command) in the presence of his Privy Councell, he made a most godly and Princely declaration of his intent, in sommoning this Assembly, in effect, thus; That "this his proceeding was no novell devise, but ac- "cording to the example of all Christian Princes, "who in the commencement of their raignes, usual- "ly take the first course for the establishing of the "Church both for doctrine and Policy, to which "the very Heathen themselves had relation in this "their Proverbe, à Ioue Principium. And particu- "larly in this land, King Henry the eight, towards the "end of his raigne, after him King Edward the sixt, "who altred more; after him Queene Mary, who "reversed all; and the last Queene of famous memo- "ry, who setled the Church state as now it stand- "eth. Wherein yet his Majestie deemed himselfe "happier then they, in that they were faine to alter "those things which they found established, where- "as himselfe saw yet no cause, so much to change a- "ny thing, as to confirme that which He found so "well setled already. Which State so affected his "Royall heart, that it pleased him, both to enter in- "to a gratulation to almighty God, (at which words "he put off his Hat) for bringing him into the land "of Promise, where Religion was purely professed, "where he sate among grave, learned, and reverend "Divines, who better knew what belonged to the "State of a King, to the honour and order of a king- "dome, then some other Nations did, and withall to "assure the Prelacy there present, that Hee inten- "ded not any Innovation, acknowledging the Go- "vernement Ecclesiasticall to have beene approved "by manifold blessings from God himselfe, both for "the encrease of the Gospell, and with a most happy "and glorious peace. Yet, because nothing could "be so absolutely ordered, but that somewhat might "be added, and in any State, as in the body of man, "Corruptions like ill humours might insensibly "grow either through time or persons; his purpose "was, after the example of a good Physician, to "make search into the supposed diseases, and to exa- "mine the complaints, so to remove the occasions "thereof, if they prove scandalous, or to cure them, "if they were dangerous, or if but frivolous, yet to "take knowledge of them, thereby at once both to "cast a sop into the mouth of Cerberus, and of all fa- "ctious spirits, and withall to give satisfaction to all "quiet and sober minded men.

(20) His Majesty concluding this his generall advertisement, entred more particular discourse with the Bishops (for his owne private information) concerning the Booke of Common Prayer, Excommunication in the Ecclesiasticall Courts, and the provision; of fit and able Ministers for Ireland. Touching matters in the said Booke, hee desired satisfaction. First, for Confirmation, which if it were held and so called, as if the Sacrament of Baptisme were thereby confirmed, and were invalidous without it, then was it in his judgement blasphemous: but if it were only that Children, who at their Baptisme made profession of their faith by the mouthes of others, might before the Bishops professe it in their owne persons, and so receive Episcopall Benediction by prayer, and imposition of hands, then was it of very sacred use in Gods Church. Secondly, for Absolution, which his Majesty had heard compared to the Popes pardons. Thirdly, for Private Baptisme, which he utterly disliked to be administred, but by a lawfull Minister. His second point was Excommunication, wherein hee moved two especiall considerations; the one of the Matter, that the sentence being so waightie, was not to be pronounced upon every slight cause: the other of the Persons, why Lay-men as Chancellors and Commissaries, and not rather the Deane and Chapter, or other grave Ministers and Chaplaines should be assumed by the Bishops for their assistants therein. The last, which was touching a sufficient Ministery in Ireland, his Majesty referred to another day.

(21) But his Majesty received full satisfaction and contentment by the severall answers to all his demands. Touching Confirmation, that the Church of England held it no essentiall part of the Sacrament of Baptisme, but a * practise of the Primitive Church, yea of the * Apostles, (as * Calvin himselfe expounds their meaning, who also wished the restitution thereof in such Churches where it had beene abolished,) and for imposition of hands on children, warranted by * Christ himselfe, a Custome still retained in our Church, as very godly and necessary for those very reasons, and uses, which his Majesty had mentioned, and truly observed. Touching Absolution, it was answered, that as Christ desired not the death of sinners, so he hath given power and commandement to his Ministers, to pronounce his mercy with remission of sinnes unto all Penitents, that the practise hereof in the English Church, is so farre from Popery, as that the Reformed Churches of Augusta, Boheme, and Saxony, doe both allow it, and retaine it, yea and Calvin himselfe approves it. Of Private Baptisme it was answered, that though the words seemed somewhat doubtfull, yet the practise of the English Church did contradict all administration of it by Laickes and women, in censuring them in that case: whereupon it was concluded, that a lawfull Minister only should be imployed in times of necessitie, when the Infant was in danger of life; yet so understood, that the person was in no wise to be reputed of the Essence of the Sacrament. And finally, for Excommunication, it was there resolved, that the abuses (if any such there were) being removed and amended, that sacred censure should retaine its necessary vigour in the Church; and so for that day his Majestie dismissed the Assembly of his Prelates.

(22) Vpon Munday following, being the sixteenth of Ianuary, those other Doctors, who were to relate the diflikes of the Opposites, were called likewise into the Privy Chamber, were in presence of his Prelates and Peeres, his Majesty delivered unto them, a pithy and princely declaration of his minde; "That He intended not to innovate the go- "vernment now established, which by long expe- "rience he had found accomplished with so singular "blessings of God forty five yeares, as that no "Church upon the face of the earth hath more flou- "rished then this of England. But rather his meaning, "and earnest desire was, first to settle uniformitie "through the whole, for the more quiet and flou- "rishing estate thereof: secondly, to plant unitie for "the suppression of Papists, and enemies of Religion: "thirdly to amend abuses, as incident to Bodies Poli- "ticke, as the shadow to the body Naturall; which "once getting entrance, hold on as a Wheele doth "his motion, when it is once set on going. Among "the complaints therefore of many grievances made "since his entrance into England, none was more "weighty, nor himselfe more willing to heare and "amend, then such as might concerne the state of "the Church, if the same did in any wise decline "from the ancient and Apostolicall rule. For which "cause he had sent for them, whom he understood "to bee grave, learned, and modest Divines, to "heare by them those grievances, and severall obje- "ctions at large, and desired them boldly to declare "the same.

so godly, so learned, so carefull a King, reduced all matters, either desired, or disliked amongst the weake Brethren (whose Spokesman hee protested hee would not have beene, but onely upon his Majesties mandatory Summons) unto those foure heades: 1. for preservation of true doctrine, 2. for placing of good Pastors, 3. for sincere administration of the Church governments; 4. for explanation of some clauses in the Common-prayer Booke. It would bee here too impertinent, to force an historicall Narration with those Theologicall particulars, which upon those severall points were then produced, and are * elsewhere to be found exactly related. Yet as wee cannot but commend the judgement of these foure Divines (as touching the third point) in that, finding no just exception to the Episcopall Hierarchie of our Church, in no one word they impugned or disapproved the same; so much more must wee celebrate the admirall dexterity, judgement and learning of his sacred Majesty, joyned with so rare industry and patience, whose owne accurate search and exquisite expositions of Scriptures, Fathers, and primitive practises, did there both breed wonder and astonishment in that noble and learned audience, and also give singular satisfaction (even to the * agents for the Opposites) touching all the exceptions taken to the Church-state; which his Majesty now found to bee no other then the phantasmes of a scrupulous indiscretion.

(24) The Wednesday following, being the 18. of Ianuary (appointed for the next meeting) his Majesty againe, with most of the Lords of his Privy Councell, entred the Chamber; where the Reverend Prelates with such others onely as the Lord Archbishop appointed, (for so his Majesty commanded) being admitted to his Royall presence, after some conference about the High Commission Court Subscription, Oath ex Officio, and the like, his Majesty (causing the other foure Divines to bee then called in) was pleased to declare what formerly had past; and for a conclusion, shut up all with a godly exhortation, "like another Constantine, perswading every man to "unity, and to a diligent discharge of their duties, "in their severall places; the superiours to governe "without violence, the inferiors to obey without "murmuring, and all of them to build Gods Tem- "ple without sound of discord; desiring and com- "manding all present, not onely themselves to labour "that way, but to be a meanes to draw on all others "unto a peaceable conformity, the matters being no "other (as now hee saw plainely) but of meere "weaknesse: wherein persons discreet would doubt- "lesse be easily henceforward reclaimed, and for the "undiscreet and reluctant, their roomes were more "behoovefull then their services: by their fruits "therefore Hee should discerne and judge them; O- "bedience and Humility being the markes of honest "and good men, which thenceforth hee would ex- "pect from as many as would be held well affected "to his Majesty and his State. Which Princely exhortation (delivered with much more feeling words, and mooving earnestnesse) was so piercing, as it fetched teares from some of both sides, and all unanimously protested their most dutifull obedience to those his Royall commands.

(25) Besides this maine fruit of this famous conference, the setling of the Church-peace, sundry other important matters (not here to be pretermitted, because necessarily tending to that noble end) were therein also projected, and by his Majesties ever provident care had then their conception, though after-times brought the births to perfection. The first (both in due ranke and use) was his sacred Decree for a new Translation of the holy Scriptures, upon a Princely and pious care of Gods eternall Truth according to the Originals, as also for an uniforme reading thereof in the Churches. To which end three selected Companies from Oxford, Cambridge, and in London, most judicious in the languages and learning being imployed, after long conference, much reading, and diligent comparing of all translations with the ancient originals, it is now most exactly and happily published, as a witnesse to the World both of Gods constant promise, that Heaven and Earth should perish, but his Word should never: and also of the Religious care of this his Vice-gerent, in seeking even at the first, the first thing that man is commanded to seeke after, whose praise shall stand for ever in the Record of that godly worke, and the worke shall justifie it selfe against all gaine-sayers to Gods eternall glory, and many soules great comfort.

(26) His second sacred project was, that as now in England, so also in Ireland, Wales, and the Northerne parts, true Religion (which Hee there avowed to be the onely bond of true obedience) might be throughly planted. Which religious purpose Hee so zealously prosecuted, especially for the North and all Scotland, as that Hee held it not sufficient to have joyned these two Kingdomes into one Temporall Monarchy, unlesse Hee might see them both united also in the Doctrine, Regiments and Rites of one spirituall Hierarchy. Neither was his Princely wisdome for the meanes lesse conspicuous, then his zeale in the intendment, in making so heedfull choyce of such English Divines, as were (not long after) in this employment sent into Scotland; the very first, in which Apostolike Ambassage for establishing those Neighbour-Churches was hee, whose eminency both for Place and Piety, is now worthily formost in guiding our owne; and whose blessed travels in that service, as they were acceptable to God, his Majesty, and that Nation; so are they a document to others, how powfull and admirably successefull true Learning is, where it is guided with true Prudence, and where Piety and love of Gods glory is linked with Charity, and zeale of mans good.

(27) This great businesse and conference so royally accomplished, his Majesties next care was (herein also as another Constantine) to perpetuate the maintenance of this flourishing Church (whose peaceable estate he had thus provided for) with the revenewes of her ancient foundations, as also to establish salutary lawes for the peaceable governement of his people; to which purpose, a Parliament was assembled at Westminster, the 19. of March, wherein, for the Church it was enacted, that neither Archbishop nor Bishop should alienare, assure, give, grant, demise, or in any sort convay, no not to the King himselfe, his Heires, or Successors, any of the Honors, Castles, Manors, Lands, Tenements, or Hereditaments, being parcell of the possessions of his Archbishoppricke, or Bishoppricke; and if any so were, to be utterly voide and of none effect, notwithstanding any former Law, Statute, Act, or Ordinance to the contrary.

(28) Foure dayes before this Parliament commenced, it pleased his Majesty, with the most Noble Queene Anne, and the most Illustrious Prince Henry, attended with glorious troupes of great Peeres, Prelates, and Courtiers, to ride in triumph through the City of London to Westminster, the Houses beautified with rich hangings, the streets adorned with goodly Trophees and Pageants, of severall Nations inhabiting, the Rayles on both sides covered with blew Cloth, the severall Companies Honourably addressed, and ranked under the displayed Ensignes and Armes of their severall Trades and Sciences; the one shewing the wealth and state of the City; the other, the body of the Citizens and governement, and all making manifest the unspeakeable joy they conceived to receive their great Soveraigne into this His City, and Imperiall Chamber. In pledge of which their excessive joy, unfained love, and vowed fidelity, the Recorder at the Crosse in Cheape, both gratulated his Majesty with a * pithy speech in the Name of the City, and wishing him a golden Raigne, presented his Greatnesse with a Psal. 141. 6.

(29) Neither lesse was his Majesties desire to retaliate the Citizens and other his Subjects true affections, when recounting the great hinderances of Merchandizing and Navigations of trafficke, by reason of the long continued breach betwixt England and Spaine, his royall heart tendring his Subjects tranquillitie, endevoured to salve against those wounds of discord with the * sweet balme of Peace; which was solemnly proclaimed in London, August 19. the Sea being made open to Merchants for their free commerce.

The two Kingdoms united under the name of Great Britaine.

(30) Both Domesticke and forraine affaires thus plausibly composed, as his Majesty was the first, who in this last age of the World held the Scepter of the whole Iland in his royall hand, so to unite the two stiles under the name of one entire Empire, and the two Nations into a joynt blessed unitie; He caused himselfe by Proclamation to be enstiled, King of great Britaine, according to the ancient name of this Ile before the Saxons Conquest, the restoring of which name againe, many fore-dooming spirits had anciently presaged, as now we see effected. Vnto which Imperiall stile, are rightly annexed the Kingdomes of France and Ireland, rightfully belonging by birth and Conquest unto the Crowne of England.

Iesuites and Seminary Priests banished.

(31) Two other Proclamations afterwards came forth; the one for the Banishment of all Iesuites and Seminary Priests, out of the Land; and the other, to confirme the Ecclesiasticall government, and Booke of Common Prayer, in the same forme and estate, as Queene Elizabeth left them, to the no little griefe of the workers for Rome, whose desgines began now to sucke in such poyson, as in the venting whereof, not onely the Earth might have trembled under the weight of such Monsters, but even the Heavens be astonied and confounded, to give those Serpents the breath or benefit of Ayre. Vnto which bloudy, horrible, and odious act to God and man, my Stile must now turne: a matter indeed so distastive for me to remember, or to write of, that it abhorres my very soule to fill the Pen with Inke, or to blot the Paper with these blacke spots of darknesse, and deformers of Englands faire face.

Ier. 2. 12. The treason conceived against the State.

The heathenish cruelty of the Gunpowder Treason.

(32) The Plot was to undermine the Parliament House, and with Gunpowder to blow up the King, the Prince, Clergy, Nobles, Knights, and Burgesses, the very confluence of all the flower of Glory, Pietie, Learning, Prudence, Authoritie in the Land; Fathers, Sonnes, Brothers, Allyes, Friends, Foes, Papists, and Protestants, all at one blast. A stratagem invented by him that blowes the bellowes of destruction; fashioned in the forge of the bottomlesse pit; put in practise in a vault of darknesse; and forwarded by him that is the Father of darknesse; and in darknesse I could wish it might ever dwell: whose like was never revealed to the light of the Sunne. Their intent, when that irreligious atchievement had beene performed, was, to surprize the remainder of the Kings Issue; to alter Religion and the State, and to bring in forraine Power. Sir Edmund Baynam an attainted person (who stiled himselfe Prince of the damned Crew) was sent unto the Pope, as he was a temporall Prince, to acquaint him with the Gunpowder-Treason; a fit Poste indeed to be imployed betwixt the Pope and the Divell.

The Traytors Intents.

Baynam appointed the Post. Pag. 133.

(33) This Treason was first set on foot in the last yeare of the late Queenes Raigne, when Henry Garnet the Superiour of the Iesuites, Catesby and others sent Thomas Winter into Spaine to negociate with King Philip in the name of the English Catholikes; first, to send an Army unto them, who now were in a readinesse to joyne their Forces with his: secondly, to grant some Pensions unto sundry persons devoted to his service in England: and thirdly, to give advertisement of the discontents that the young Gentlemen and Souldiers had conceived upon the death of Essex, whereby a most fit occasion was then offered to forward the common cause. To prosecute which businesse, he made for his meanes Father Creswell the Leiger Iesuite in Spaine, Don Petro Francesa second Secretary to the State, and the Duke of Lerma, a great Counsellor to the King; all of them assuring this ill commissioned Ambassador, that the Office of his employment would bee very gratefull to their Master.

The plots determined for the Invasion of England.

(34) The place for landing concluded upon by these wise Statists, was Kent or Essex, if the Kings Army were great; if otherwise, then Milford Haven in Wales was held fittest: with these and other like complots, Winter all that Summer followed the King in his Progresse, and lastly had answer by the Count Miranda, that his King would bestow a hundred thousand Crownes towards the expedition, halfe thereof to be paid that present yeare, and the rest in the next Spring, when (at the fartheſt) he meant to set foot in England; on whose behalfe he willed the English Catholikes to maintaine their promise, whom hee respected (as was avowed) as his owne proper Castilians: And further desired their continuall advertisements, if in the meane time it chanced the old Queene to die.

The hopes of the English Catholikes.

(35) Winter thus laden with hopes, returneth from Spaine, and emptieth his male into the bosomes of Garnet, Catesby, and Tresham, and they unto others, all of them tickled to heare the newes, rested fully satisfied, expecting the day. But before the Spring-time was fully approached, that Morning Starre, and Mirror of her Sexe, did set in our West, the thrice-glorious Elizabeth, who had now judged Israel full fortie foure yeares in admirable tranquilitie, as in her Raigne we have sufficiently seene. To signifie whose death, Christopher Wright was from Catesby and others sent into Spaine, and Guy Fawkes likewise was posted thither from Bruxels, by Sir William Stanley, both of them to prosecute the former negotiation, assuring the Spanish King, that King Iames meant to runne the same course, and to proceed as rigorously against the Catholikes, as the late Queene had done: for whose defence they instantly desired that some Spaniards might be transported unto Milford-Haven, where the Romish-minded would be forward to assist them, having in a readinesse two thousand Horse furnished for the enterprise. But King Philip aswell poizing his honour, as his zeale for Religion, and observing a great difference betwixt States in hostilitie, and of Kings raigning in friendship, in no wise would listen to invade England, or further to proceed in any forceable enterprise.

Christopher wright sent into Spaine, to signifie the death of the Queene.

King Philip refuseth all hostile attempts against England.

(36) In the meane while the Iesuites had beene tampering to dissuade the acceptance of King Iames into England, urging it for a Maxime, that death was to be endured, rather then to admit an heretike (so it pleased them to terme the Lords annointed) and those that gave him consent they held lyable to Excommunication by the censure of Pope Clement the eight, who had liberally bestowed upon his sacred Person, the names of a Puritan, an Heretike, a Calvinist, a persecutor of Protestants, and another Iulian Apostata.

(37) The Romanists thus loosened from their Anker-hold of Spaine, and left by that pylote to shift for themselves, now perceived their owne error in their long expectation, That change of State, would change Religion: but thee now gone, whose life they had often laid for, and her godly Successor no whit inferior to her for advancing the Gospell: their hopes grew desperate (as these desperates alleaged) and no other meanes now left them but onely to kill the King, whom they falsely calumniated to have broken his promise for a toleration in Religion, as Watson and Percy had divulged among them; yea, and a fraudulent message was sent to the King James scandalized by the Papists.

Pope by the Scotish Secretary, that K. Iames would become his obedient sonne. But how farre his religious heart was from these aspersions, appeared both by Watson himselfe, who, condemned to die, tooke it upon the salvation of his soule, that hee could not draw the smallest comfort from the King for a toleration of the Catholikes, but that himselfe had imparted his words in a milder tune then his Majesty meant them, onely to keepe (as hee excused the matter) the Catholikes in love and duty unto the King: and since by the Lord of Balmerinoth (Secretary to the King in Scotland) who acknowledging his offence, hath beene arraigned, and found guilty of death, for devising letters, and sending them to Rome, which himselfe cunningly got signed in shuffling them amongst others, his Majesty being utterly ignorant of the Contents.

(38) Vpon which false suggestions, the Athiesticall position of Catesby was grounded, who held it for an Axiome, as Father Parsons had taught: That the whole Schoole both of Divines, and Lawyers make it a position certaine, and to bee undoubtedly beleeved, That if any Christian Prince whatsoever, shall manifestly turne from the Catholike Religion, and desire or seeke to reclaime other men from the same, he presently falleth from all Princely power, and dignity, and that also by vertue, and power of the Law it selfe both divine, and humane, even before any sentence pronounced against him by the supreme Pastor, and Iudge. And that his Subjects of what estate or condition soever, are freed from all bond of Oath of Alleagiance, which at any time they had made unto him as to their lawfull Prince. Nay, that they both may, and ought (provided they have competent strength, and force) cast out such a man from bearing rule among Christians, as an Apostata, an Heretik, a Backe-slider, and Revolter from our Lord Iesus Christ, and an enemy to his owne State and Common-wealth, lest perhaps hee might infect others, or by his example or command, turne them from the faith. Yea, one step further elsewhere is stood upon, that if any Prince shall but favour or shew countenance to an Hereticke, he presently looseth his Kingdome. And thus they conclude, that for Heresie a Prince is to bee deposed, and his Kingdome to bee bestowed at the pleasure of the Pope, for whom the People upon paine of damnation are to take part, and fight: out of which detestable conclusions, arose the first smoake of the Gunpowder Treason.

(40) Winter thus posted to negotiate with the Constable, found him at Bergen neere Dunkirke, and by the meanes of Owen the fugitive Traytor, delivered his message; whose answere was, that hee had a strict command from his Master to doe all good offices for the Catholikes, and for his owne part hee found himselfe bound to continue not to omit any good occasion that might forward their cause: although indeed hee did but temporize, as Sir William Stanley told Winter, for the great desire which the Spaniards had that the Peace might proceed with England. Whereupon Winter (hopelesse that way) returned for England, bringing with him the fore said Fawkes, a fit instrument for so divelish a designe; and comming to Lambeth, told Catesby that the Constable was not the man whatsoever were his words, and that all now in those parts were bent for a conclusion of Peace; which founded so harshly in his ill-tuned eares, that his braines became more bufied about his impious Project, and his mind in continuall travell to bring forth that sinne, which he had most unnaturally conceived.

(41) Robert Catesby, Iohn Wright, Thomas Winter, and Guy Fawkes holding a community in their mischeifes still about London; about the middest of Easter-Terme, Thomas Percy as hotte as the Hotspur himselfe to forward Rebellion, came puffing to Catesbies lodging in Lambeth. and the first word hee spake, was this: What Gentlemen, shall wee alwayes be talking, and never doe any thing? you perceive (I know) how things doe proceede. To whom Catesby answered, that something was resolved upon, but first an Oath for secresie was to bee ministred. For which purpose they appointed to meete some three dayes after behind Saint Clements Church without Temple-Barre, where being met, and falling in Conference, Catesby alleaged that this last Parliament had left the Catholikes in as much danger as they stood before, and that now the peace with Spaine was rather a meane for harder Lawes to proceed, then those in force against them to be abrogated; so that the ancient Romish Religion, and the Catholike professors thereof, must now be enforced to bid England adue, if Gentlemen of power, and repute should thus give way to the contrary proceedings, or thus make nice how to helpe, or where to beginne: At which speech Percy made present answer, Himselfe was the man that would under goe the Catholike cause, were it with the slaughter of the King, which hee was there ready to undertake and doe.

(42) No, Tom (said Catesby) thou shalt not adventure thy selfe to so small purpose, if thou wilt bee a Traytor, there is a Plot to greater advantage, and such a one as can never bee discovered: and thereupon all of them taking the Oath of secresie, hearing the Masse, and receiving the Sacrament, Catesby tolde them his divelish device, which was by Mine, and Gunpowder to blow up the Parliament House, and at one stroke with the destruction of many, effect that at once, which had been many yeers in attempting. A matter easily performed (as hee urged) if men of resolution would thereunto bestow their purse, and their paines; and most sure from suspition of discovery, the designe being so estranged from th conceit of man: wherein he also observed that religious Iustice was thirsty of revenge, even upon the same persons, and in the same place, whence these first received the unjust Lawes enacted against her. For case of conscience to kill the Innocent, with the nocent; he told them it was warrantable by the authority of Garnet himselfe, the Superiour of the English Iesuites, and of Gerrard, and Tesmond (Iesuiticall Priests likewise) who by their Apostolicall Power did absolve and commend the fact, which for the advantage of the Catholikes was to be executed (they said) though with the death of some Innocents, rather then the service should quaile, the necessity of time, and occasion so requiring it. The Oath was given them by the said Gerrard (the Divels Atturney in this businesse) the forme whereof was as followeth.

Catesbies observations for Iustice.

(43) The project thus farre passed, the practise was to proceed; and the first thing sought after was for a house wherein they might begin their worke, to which purpose, no place was held fitter then a certaine edifice adioyning to the wall of the Parliament House, which served for with-drawing roomes for the Assembled Lords; and out of Parliament was at the disposse of the Keeper of the place, and Wardrobe thereunto belonging. These did Percy hier for his lodgings, entertaining Fawkes (as most unknowne by face) for his man, who changing his name into Iohnson, had the Keyes, and keeping of the roomes. Neither was this enough, but a house must bee also had to supply Percies lodgings for provision of Powder, and to frame, and fit wood for the carriage of the Mine, which Catesby provided at Lambeth, and sware Robert Keyes into their Conspiracies, making him the Keeper of those his provisions, who in the night as occasion served, conveyed the same unto the custody of Fawkes.

Fawkes changed his name into Iohnson.

(44) The appointed day for the Parliament being the 7. of February; in October before, it was thought fit to beginne the worke, whereupon Fawkes returning forth of the Countrey, found Percies roomes appointed for the Scotish Lords to meete in, there to conferre touching the Union of the two Kingdomes; so that they feared (for that present) to initiate their attempt. But that honourble assembly dissolved, upon the eleventh of December late in the night, they entred into their Worke of darkenesse, and begun their Mine; having tooles prepared, and baked meates provided, the better to avoid suspition by sending abroad.

(45) The Moles that first under went these undermines, were Robert Catesby Esquire, the moving Arch-Traytor, and ruine of his name, Thomas Percy Esquire, kinsman, and attendant upon the Earle of Northumberland; Thomas Winter, Iohn Wright, and Guy Fawkes, Gentlemen, and Thomas Bates, Catesbies, man, all of them grounded Schollers of the Romish Schoole, and such earnest labourers in this their Vault of Villany, that by Christmas Eve (which very day might have remembred them of more Christian workes) they had brought the worke under an entry, unto the wall of the Parliament House, underpropping still as they went the earth with their framed Timber, nor till that day were they seene abroad of any man.

(46) During this undermining, much consultation was had how to fashion the rest of the businesse, after the deed should bee accomplished, and many questions propounded, and argued at full, before they could pitch on a setled resolution. The first was how to surprize the next heire to the Crowne; for though they doubted not, but Prince Henry would accompany his Father, and take his lot with him, yet they feared lest D. Charles (being absent, as too yong to attend at Parliament) would escape their train, and perchance bee so carefully guarded, and attended upon at Court, that hee would hardly bee gotten into their hands. Of which first rub in their way, Percy offered himselfe to bee the first remover, and shewed his meanes, which was, that with some other Gentlemen, hee would enter the Dukes Chamber, which by reason of his acquaintance hee very well might doe without any suspition: and others of his like acquaintance should bee placed at severall dores in the Court: so that when the blow was given, and all men in a maze, then would he carry away the Duke, which hee presumed would be easily done, the most of the Court being then absent, and they present altogether unprovided for to make resistance.

Duke Charles intended to be surprized.

(47) For the surprize of the Lady Elizabeth, it was held a matter of farre lesse difficulty, shee remaining at the Lord Haringtons, and Ashby (Catesbies House) neer unto her, whither under a shew of Hunting, divers Catholikes should bee gathered, who having the aduantage in knowing for what purpose they were assembled, had the full liberty of that distracted time, to provide money, horses, armour, and other habiliments of war, under pretence of strength to guard, and secure the Heire apparant.

The Lady Elizabeth intended to be taken from the Lord Harrington.

(48) Then it was discussed, what Lords they should save from the Parliament; where it was agreed, that they should keepe thence as many as they could that were Catholikes, or that way favouring: all others to feele the smart, and the imputation of the Treason to bee cast upon the Puritans; to make them more odious to the World.

The fearesconceived upon the Treason to forraign Princes.

(49) Next it was controverted what forraigne Princes should be made privy to these their purposes; for to enjoyne them to secresie, or to oblige them by oath, was not in their power: and to affay their likes or dislikes, would prove dangerous. For if any of them approved the designe, their preparation might beget suspition: if not, then the feares of discovery would extinguish the enterprize, no man daring to proceed further therein. Spaine was held the fittest to second their attemps, but hee was to slow in his preparations, and France too neere, and too dangerous to bee dealt with; and how Holland stood affected to England they all very well knew. But in the midst of these turmoiles, and minings underground, the Parliament was again adjourned till the fift of October ensuing. Vpon which Proclamation they brake off both discourse, and worke till the Feast of Saint Maries Purification. At which time they laide in powder, and other provisions, and then began againe to worke, having taken into their company Christopher Wright, and Robert Winter, both of the sworne, and receiving the Sacrament for secresie. The wall (which was very hard, and nine foote thick) with great labour they wrought halfe through, Fawkes being their Centinell to give warning when any came neere, that the noyse in digging might not be heard.

The Parliament prorogued.

Robert Winter, christopher wright taken into consort. The worke begun.

(50) The labourers thus working into the wall, were suddenly surprized with a great feare, and casting from them their digging Tooles, tooke to their weapons, having sufficient of shot, and powder in the house, being fully resolved, rather to die in the place, then to yeeld or be taken. The cause of their feare, was a noyse they heard in a roome under the Parliament House, under which they meant to have mined, directly under the Chaire of Estate. But all now at a stand, and their countenance cast each upon other, as doubtfull what would be the issue of this their enterprize: Fawkes scowted forth to descry (if he could (what was done abroad, and finding all safe, and free from suspect, returned, and told them, the noyse was onely a removall of coales there now upon sale, and that the Cellar was to bee let, which would bee more commodious to their purpose, and would also spare the labour in the Mine. Whereupon Thomas Percy under pretence for stowage of his winter provision of wood, and coales, went, and hired the Cellar, which done, a new conference was had.

The sense of the Treyton.

(51) Wherein Catesby found the weight of the whole to heavy for himselfe alone to support; for besides the maintenance of so many persons, and the severall houses for severall uses, hired, and paide for by him, the Gunpowder, and other provisions would rise to a very great summe, and indeed too much for one mans purse. Therefore he desired that himselfe, Percy, and some one more might call in such others as they thought fit to helpe to maintaine the charge, alleadging that they knew men of worth, and wealth, that would willingly assist, but were not willing their names should be knowne to the rest. This his request they approved as necessary, and withall surceasing further to digge in the Vault, knowing the Cellar would be of better use for their designes, they removed twenty Barrels of Gunpowder into that roome, which they covered with a thousand of Billets, and five hundred of Faggots, so that now the lodging roomes were cleered of all suspitious provisions, and freely might bee entred without danger of descry.

(52) But the Parliament being againe prorogued untill the fifth of November following, these foresaid underminers of our State, and happinesse, thought fit they should againe (for a while) dispersse themselves (matters being already in so good forwardnes) and that Guy Fawkes should go over to acquaint Sir William Stanley, and Master Hugh Owen with these their proceedings, yet so as the oath of secresie should be taken of them. For their policy was to have Sir William Stanleys presence so soone as the dismall blow should be given, to be a leader to their intended stratagems, whereof (as they thought) they should have great need, and that Owen should remaine where he was, to hold correspondency with forraigne Princes, to allay (as much as hee might) the odiousnes of the fact, or to impute the Treason to the Puritans discontents.

(53) Fawkes comming into Flanders found Owen, unto whom, after the oath, hee declared the plotte, which hee very well approved. But Sir William Stanley (at that time in Spaine) Owen said would be hardly drawne into the businesse, for that hee had suits in the English Court himselfe, yet hee promised to forward him in all that hee could, and to send him into England with the first, when their project had taken effect. Whereupon Fawkes to avoid further suspition, kept still in Flanders untill the beginning of September, and then returning, received the keys of the Cellar, and laid in more powder, billets, and fagots; which done, hee retired into the Countrey, and there kept till the end of October.

(54) In the meane while Catesby, and Percy meeting at the Bathe, it was there concluded, because their number were but few, that Catesby himselfe should have power to call in whom hee would to aide their designe: by which authority hee tooke in Sir Everard Digby of Rutlandshire knight, and Francis Tresham of Northamptonshire Esquire, both of them of sufficient estate, and wealth, had they not abused both to their owne destruction: for Sir Everard offered fifteene hundred pounds to forward the action, and Tresham two thousand. But Percy disdaining that any should out run him in evill, promised foure thousand pounds out of the Earle of Northumberlands rents, and tenne horses of speed to fleed them when the blow was past. Against which time to provide munition, Catesby likewise tooke in Ambrose Rookewood, and Iohn Grant two Recusant Gentlemen, and undoubtedly others were written in the same Roll, had these two grand Electors beene apprehended alive, whose owne tongues onely could unfold their Catalogues Record.

(55) The businesse thus forwarded by their complices abroad, their Inmates did not neglect the supplies at home. For Percy, Winter, and Fawkes had stored the Cellar with thirty sixe Barrels of Gunpowder, and upon them bestowed (in steed of shot) Barres of Iron, logges of timber, massie stones, Iron Crocs, Picke-axes, and all their working tooles, and (to cover all) great store of Billets, and fagots, so that nothing was wanting but all in a readinesse, attending that great, and terrible day. Neither were the Iesuiticall Priests slacke on their parts, who usually concluded their Masses, and oblatory Sacrifices, with their prayers for the good successe of their expected hopes, as by these verses, made, and used by Garnet is to be seene.

Vt Christo laudes debitas persolvamus alacriter.

And others thus, Prosper Lord their paines that labour in thy cause day, and night, let Heresie vanish away like smoake, let their memory perish with a cracke, like the ruine, and fall of a broken house: Allusions doubtlesse to the labours in the Vault, the mounting smoake of powder, and the fall of the Parliament House, which if it had happened, they might have said to have beene Prophetically fore-told by their high Priests for that yeere.

(56) But the Lord that never slipt the deliverance of his elect, kept this his Israel as the Apple of his owne eye, and this pit digged for the destruction of others, they fell into themselves: so that wee may well say, If the Lord had not been on our sides when men rose up against us, they had swallowed us up quicke, when their wrath was kindled against us, but praised bee the Lord which hath not given us a prey unto their teeth: our soule is escaped even as a Bird out of the snare of the Fowler, the snare is broken, and wee are delivered. For this Cockatrice egge hatched by themselves, proved a Serpent onely to themselves, and themselves (by Gods hand) made the onely Instruments to breake the shell of their owne Treason.

Psal. 124.

(57) For upon Thursday in the evening, ten dayes before the intended Parliament, a Letter directed to the Lord Monteagle, was delivered by an unknowne person unto his footman in the street, with a straight charge given, to give it into his Lords owne hand, which accordingly he did. The Letter was without date, and subscription, and somewhat unlegible, so as the Nobleman called for one of his servants to assist him therein, the strange contents whereof much perplexed the true construction, as whether writ by some Pasquill to scarre him from attendance, or as matter of consequence from advise of some friend. Howsoever, though it were Supper time, and the night as darke as the purport of the Letter; yet to discharge his loyall duty, hee forth-with repayred to the Kings Palace at White-Hall, where hee imparted the Letter to the Earle of Salisbury, Principall Secretary, and they both presently acquainted the Lord Chamberlaine therewith, who deemed the matter not a little to concerne himselfe, the charge of his Office being to over-see all places whither his Majesty was to repaire; these two Counsellors shewed the same Letter to the Earles of Worcester & Northampton, who together concluded (how sleight soever the contents seemed to appeare, as proceeding from some surmizes of an idle, & light braine (to accordingly was done, and was as followeth.

The Letter sent to the Lord Monteagle.

My Lord, out of the love I beare to some of your friends, I have a care of your preservation. Therefore I would advise you, as you tender your life, to devise some excuse to shift off your attendance at this Parliament. For God and man have concurred to punish the wickednesse of this time. And thinke not slightly of this advertisment, but retire your selfe into your Country, where you may expect the event in safety. For though there be no appearance of any stirre, yet I say, they shall receive a terrible blow this Parliament, and yet they shall not see who hurts them. This counsell is not to be contemned, because it may doe you good, and can doe you no harme; for the danger is past so soone as you have burnt the Letter. And I hope God will give you the grace to make good use of it: to whose holy protection I commend you.

(58) His Majesty a while pausing, and then re-reading the letter, delivered his judgement, that the stile thereof was too quicke, and pithy to bee a libel bred from the superfluities of an idle braine, and on the instant did apprehend by these words; that they should receive a terrible blow at this Parliament, and yet should not see who hurt them; that a fudden danger by blast of Gunpowder should be intended by some base villaine in a corner, no insurrection, rebellion, or desperate attempt appearing. And therefore wished that the under roomes of the Parliament House might be throughly searched, before himselfe, or Peeres should sit therein. To which purpose it was then concluded, that the Lord Chamberlaine should (according to his Office & place) view all the roomes above, and below: but as well to stay idle rumors, as to let things ripen to reveale their own Mysteries, this his search should be deferred untill Munday, the day immediately before the Parliament, and then to be with a seeming sleight eye, to avoide suspect.

(59) The Earle of Suffolke, Lord Chamberlaine, according to the conclusion, upon Munday in the afternoone (being accompanied with the L. Monteagle, who still thirsted to see the issue) repaired unto those under-roomes, and finding the Sellar so sufficiently ciently ſtored with wood and coales, demanded of Fawkes (the counterfeit Iohnſon, who ſtood there attending as a ſervant of ſmall repute) who owed the place: his anſwere was, that the lodgings belonged to Maſter Thomas Percy, and the Sellar likewiſe, to lay in his winter proviſion, himſelfe being the Keeper and Maſter Percies ſervant, Whereunto the Earle as void of any other ſuſpition, preſently replied, that his Maſter was well provided againſt Winters blaſts: but being come forth, the Lord Monteagle told him, that hee did much ſuſpect Percy to bee the inditer of the letter, knowing his affection in religion, and the friendſhip betwixt them profeſſed, ſo as his heart gave him (hee ſaid) when hee heard Percy named, that his hand was in the act.

(60) The Lord Chamberlaine returning, related to the King in preſence of ſome Counſellors, what hee had ſeene: and the ſuſpition that the Lord Monteagle had of Percy, and himſelfe of Iohnſon his man; which preſently increaſed his Majeſties apprehenſion and jealouſie, whereupon hee inſiſted, that a narrow ſearch ſhould be made, and thoſe billets and coales ſhould bee turned to the bottome, which as he confidently ſuppoſed was the covering of ſome notable intended treaſon. But ſome moved the doubt how this ſearch ſhould bee made: for albeit no caution could be to much in ſo great a danger, yet the inducement thereunto, being no more then a nameleſſe inſcript, ſhuffled no man knew whence, and might well be the evaporation of an idle brain, would ſeeme (if nothing were found) ſome ſcandall unto the State, to bee over ſuſpicious of ſo frivolous a toy, and withall might leave ſome ſad imputation on a great counſellor of the land. Notwithſtanding, his Majeſty ſtill perſiſting in his former opinion, willed that the ſearch ſhould be throughly made, and no poſſibility of danger left unexamined, unleſſe they meant to goe to the Parliament, and leave the hazard to the event, which hee thought they in conſcience were loth to doe. Whereupon it was concluded, that the ſearch ſhould be made; but under color of ſearching for certaine hangings belonging to the houſe which were miſſing, and convaied away.

(61) Sir Thomas Knevet, (now Lord Knevet, then a Gentleman of his Majeſties Privy Chamber) was imployed herein, and about midnight (before the very morning when the Parliament was to beginne) went unto the place with a ſmall but well affected company. At the dore of entrance into the Cellar, finding one (which was Guy Fawkes) at ſo unſeaſonable a time, cloaked and booted, hee thought fitte to apprehend him, and entring the place, overturned the billets and coales, when preſently hee found the Serpents neſt, ſtored with thirty ſixe barrels (ſmall and great) of gunpowder, then ſearching the villaine that ſhould have harched theſe egges, found about him a darke lanthorne, three matches and other inſtruments for blowing up the powder: who no whit daunted, inſtantly confeſſed his guiltines, and was ſo farr from contrition or repentance, as hee vowed, that had hee been found within the houſe (as indeed hee was then but immediately come foorth from his worke) hee certainely would have blowne up the houſe with himſelfe, and them all; and was ſo obdurate in his Romiſh reſolution, that being brought before the Lords of the Councell, hee lamented nothing ſo much, as that the deed had not beene done, ſaying, that the Divell and not God was the diſcoverer of the plot.

(62) As deſperate were Catesby, Percy, and the reſt, who having notice that the Lord Monteagles letter gave ſome overture of ſuſpition, yet would they ſtay to ſee the ſucceſſe, and forſooke not London untill the ſame day wherein the deed ſhould have beene done: Catesby, Percy, Rookewood, both the Wrights, and Thomas Winter, poſted all into Warwickſhire, where Grant and his aſſociates had taken certaine greathorſes out of a ſtable, to forward their hoped great day. Theſe meeting at Dunchurch, where Sir Everard Digby had made a match for a ſet hunting, not with hounds for the hare (which was only the colour) but with Nimrod for bloud, and ſurprize of the moſt vertuous young Princeſſe Lady Elizabeth, were told (by the eſcaped) of their certaine diſcovery, and preſent purſuit: when ſtrucke with terrour, not knowing where to make ſtay, or whither to ſtir, they deſperately beganne an open rebellion, pretending the cauſe was Religion, and affirming for truth, that all the Catholikes throates were appointed to bee cut. And ſo trouping together, wandred through Warwickſhiere, the edges of Worceſter, and borders of Staffordſhere, their ſervants and aiders being about fourеſcore men, and thoſe ever ready to ſteale away from them, more care was in keeping, then truſt repoſed either in their faith or defence. Yet thus ranging, and finding no reſiſtance, they rifled the Lord Windſors houſe of all the Armour, ſhot, powder, and other warlike proviſions, but the weather rainy, and the waters ſomewhat high, the powder in carriage tooke wet, and thereby became unſerviceable. God in his juſtice ſo ordering the ſucceſſes, that the element of water, and accident of fire, fought againſt them, as the ſtars in their courſes did againſt Siſera.

But their owne conſciences witneſſing what the Sheriffe knew not, told them the fault was too waighty to leave them any hope of favour: and thereupon returned anſwere, that hee had neede of greater aſſiſtance then of thoſe few numbers that were with him: before hee could be able to command or controll them. So preparing for reſiſtance, they made ready their weapons, and having laid two pound of the ſaid powder in a platter to drie in the chimney, one (Millar) comming to amend the fire, threw in a billet, wherewith a ſparke flying out, chanced to fall on the powder, whoſe ſuddaine blaſt was ſo violent, that (though being of ſo ſmall a quantity) it blew up the roofe of the houſe, and ſcorched the bodies, and faces of Catesby, Rookewood, and Grant, with ſome others, whoſe conſciences then ſtrucken with the guilt of their ſinne, made them ſee Gods ſearching juſtice in puniſhing like with like. Thus being dejected with the accident, and now knowing that all was loſt, like deſperate men, they there reſolved to die together, ſet open the gate; ſuffered the Sheriffes followers to ruſh in among them, and by valour (as they reamed it) fought for their owne deſtruction; for both the Wrights were therein ſhot downe dead, Ambroſe Rookewood, and Thomas Winter were very ſore wounded; and laſtly Catesby, and Percy reſolutely fighting, backe to backe, were both of them ſlaine with one bullet of musket-ſhot.

Some preſently ſlaine in heate of Rebellion, others deadly wounded, were taken alive, the reſt either whole, or but lightly hurt, were led priſoners to London, and to other places, all the way gazed at, reviled, and deteſted by the common people, as ſome ſtringe Monſters of the world, for this their helliſh, and horrible Treaſon; and laſtly condemned, and executed as they moſt worthily deſerved; whoſe inditements, arraignements, and confeſſions, I refer to be read in the true Relations already printed thereof, with ſundry other weighty matters thereto incident, in that learned diſcourſe, written by the moſt honourable Lord Henry

(65) In memory of which great deliverance, the fifth of November (the day appointed for mercileſſe deſtruction) was by authority of the ſame Parliament enacted to bee for ever celebrated with thanksgiving, praiſe and prayers unto our heavenly Preſerver, and to be kept holy unto the Lord through our generations, which we wiſh may bee obſerved, with no leſſe acknowledgement of Gods infinite mercies to us-ward, then was among the Iewes, the inſtitution of their Purim, for their deliverance from the practiſe of wicked Haman, that ſo our Temples being thus freed from their prophane Idolatry, wee may ever make this day as the feaſt of our dedication, like to the Maccabees, who in the ſame moneth did inſtitute theirs, by cleanſing Gods Temple of heathenith pollutions. So ſhall Chriſt with his ſpirituall approch, beautifie this Church of ours, as with his humane preſence in the Temple at Ieruſalem he celebrated that Winters feaſt of theirs: wherein hee taught that himſelfe was the true ſon of God, and the only dore by which all muſt enter. Through which therefore let us with Ieremy, approch his Altar, to make ſupplications for the Kings peace: and with Baruch to pray for the Kings life, and life of his ſonne, that their dajes may be upon the earth as the dayes of heaven, their branches as the beauteous Olive, and their roots faſtned as the cedars of Lebanon.

For my part, I have here onely pointed at His Majeſties firſt entrance and acts, rather to ſhew a liberty of writing the Kingdomes affaires, which never is permitted, ſaving under good Princes, then by my unable performance to enter into that which requires the pen of ſome judicious Tacitus, or eloquent Zenophan, and concludes with the adviſe of Amianus Marcellinus, the famous Hiſtorian: Let our men for experience more ſufficient, and for learning better known, write the reſt, whom, if it ſhall pleaſe them to enter thereupon, I adviſe to frame their pennes unto an higher Stile.

A ſummary Concluſion of the vvhole.

BY the aſſiſtance of the All-Sufficient (the onely defence and Preſerver of man) my inſufficient abilities, have attained the end of this worke, and my weake unable Perſon brought to a Period this large Edifice of GREAT BRITAINS THEATRE. How acceptable to others, I know not; but with what pains and travaile to my ſelfe, my decaied ſtrength too manifeſtly hath felt, and with what care of truth, the Authorities alleaged through the whole Proceſſe, are my witneſſes; whoſe lines have been the meaſures, and Antiquities the matter, that hath raiſed the Fabrick unto this height. The attempt was great, and farre unfit (I muſt confeſſe) for me to undergoe; which, even at the firſt entrance was ſo cenſured by the Iudicious, and in the continuance hath ſo proved: that now it being finiſhed, as the Silke-worme endeth her life in her long wrought clew, ſo I in this Theatre have built my own Grave; whoſe Architecture howſoever defective it may be faid to be, yet the project is good: and the coſt great though my ſelfe have freely beſtowed this paines to the Preſſe, without preſſing a penny from any mans purſe. For me to ſhew the vtility of Hiſtory, were to light a dimme candle before the bright Sunne; or to preſcribe a methode for their uſes, were, with Phormio to reade a Lecture of Chevalry unto great Hannibal, wars experienced Conductor: But, as our owne concerneth us neereſt (wherein my pen hath taken the freeſt acceſſe) ſo let me abridge the whole in a ſmall Circle & incompaſſe that briefly which hath been related in a far wider cirumference.

The firſt Inhabitants.

(2) Our Land, peopled from Iaphet the firſt ſonne of Noah, fell unto thoſe ſonnes of Gomer and Iavan (the firſt and fourth ſonnes of Iaphet) vvhich inhabited theſe parts of Europe, vvhoſe Iſſue vvere moſt famouſly knovvne by the name of Britaines. At firſt, naked, rude, and ignorant of the true God; yet no ſooner vvere frequented vvith the civill Romans, but that they covered their Cut-painted bodies vvith Garments, and ſhortly imitated them even in their moſt civilized actions; yea, ſcarcely vvas Chriſt taken dovvne from his Croſſe, but they became Chriſtians (the greateſt glory of any Nation) and among them the Goſpell had her firſt progreſſe by eſtabliſhed authority. Their Government vvas under Kings, and thoſe of as honourable a reſpect, as vvere any other in theſe Weſt-parts of the World, both in training their Subjects unto due obedience, and miniſtring of Lavves for the maintainance of eſtate. Their vvarres domeſticke and forraigne were ſo managed with Policy and valour, as in the one they valiantly defended themſelves againſt their aſſaults, and in the other ſteeded the Romans in moſt of their Conqueſts: which coſt them laſtly their owne ſubverſions, when their warriours and virgins were conſumed and tranſported into other parts, whilſt their native Land lay expoſed to the will of Invaders.

Enſigne, for the Conqueſt of Britaine, and the ſame firſt aſſaied by Iulius Caſar from the Coaſts of Gallia. Which his attempt was ſo honourable in eſteeme of their Emperors, that Claudius (they in ſucceſſiō) holding the Triumph but baſe, that attends upon authority without action of Price, made choiſe of Britaine to adorne his triumphant Chariot, that this Iland (ſited, as was thought, in another World, and but part thereof ſhewed by Caſar to the Romans) might adde remembrance of name to his forgetfull Perſon: and to that end, having made hither himſelfe, ſtamped his Conqueſt upon his Coines thus, DE BRITANN: and upon his aged knees crept up the ſteps of the Capitoll, to give thankes of victory unto his gods on the day of his Triumph; which, though for a ſmall part of this Ilands ſubjection, was yet accompliſhed with more then ordinary magnificence, and the ſhewes greater then uſually had been ſeene, for the Conqueſts of farre larger and better knowne Kingdoms. And with as great a care was it kept, whileſt the Romans kept their owne greatnes. But when their high-mounted Pillar overſwayed her owne Baſe, and the farre-ſpread boughs were growne too weighty for the ſtemme, many hands at once graſped at the Emperiall Crown, and all of them together tare the Branches from the Body of that faire Tree. By whom alſo the faire and flouriſhing Cedars of Britain were ſhaken, and left naked both of fruite, and leafe. So that now the glory of the one declined, and the beauty of the other utterly defaced, and neither of them able any longer to ſupport their owne ſtandings, gave place unto deſtiny that would now have both downe; whereby the Iewell ſo much deſired, and which had been kept with ſuch care, was now laid at ſtake to them that could winne it, and Britaine abandoned by the Romans, without further claime, after they had been Lords thereof the ſpace of five hundred yeeres.

(4) The next Actors upon Britaines faire Stage, were the Saxons, a people of Germany, fierce, bold, and irreligion, as, for the moſt part, the reſt of Nations in thoſe daies were. Theſe infeſting with Piracies the Coaſts of Britaine & Gallia, grew both fearefull and famous in profeſſion of military ſervices. In France they ſeized upon the Country of * Baiocaſſes; in Germany by intruſion they unſeated the Sueuians; in Holland and Frieſland, they incroached upon the Batauians, and Cimbrica Cherſoneſſus (now a continent of Denmarke) they made the place of their aboad. From whence they often aſſailed the Coaſts of this Iland, even whilſt the Romans held it for theirs, and were often put backe by Stilicho and others, whoſe praiſes the Poet Claudian chaunted aloud. But the Romans departed, and Britaine left bare of men, their land waſted by famine, tumultuous uprores, and by bandings of Great-ones who ſhould be greateſt; the Scots and Picts (ancient Enemies to their peace) tooke the advantage, and continually made bloody incurſions into their Land. And albeit a ſtone-vvall vvas raiſed athvvart the whole Continent, to impeach their inroades, yet that availed little, their aſſaults were ſo great. Whereupon the Saxons were ſent for; and in their firſt ſervice freed the Britaines from thoſe raging Picts; The Lands defence they then undertooke, and the Inhabitants conſented to maintaine the charge; which whilſt it was in giving was thankefully received, but once received was ungratefully forgot. And they (like the Ravens of Arabia, who ſo long as they are full, yeeld a pleaſant noiſe, but being empty make a horrible cry) emptied faſter then the Britaines could fill, and ever complained they had not enough, till laſtly by ſurprize they got all into their own clawes. Then divided they among themſelves the beſt of the Land, and drove their receivers into the worſt and waſte mountaines of Wales, every of their Captaines ſharing a part to himſelfe, and of one Emperiall Crowne made ſeaven Diademes to adorne their owne heads; which long were not worne, without inteſtine warres, each of them ſtriving to inlarge his owne, upon his next, till God and deſtiny againe brought all unto One, even to great Egbert, who forbade the Ilands old Name, and commanded theſe now united Provinces to bee called Anglia. Yet no ſooner was this accompliſhed, with aſſured hopes conceived, that the Saxons glory ſhould thence forward aſcend, and ſpread forth with peace, but that a ſavage nation, as fierce as the Scythians, caſt their eies of deſire upon that Beautifull Crowne, and preſently attempted, but never intermitted any bloody cruelties that could forward the ſame, till they had ſet it on their owne Helmets; and theſe Saxons worne out with reſiſtance, gave place to the Danes, when time had worne out five hundred ſixty three yeeres of their Government.

Britaine firſt named England.

The Saxons confuſion.

(5) Theſe Danes thus ſucceeding (though with no better right to enjoy) were a ſtout ſturdy Nation, whoſe many Piracies both France, and Britaigne had many times felt, before they attained the end of this their Goale. For theſe, multiplying like Bees in the Hive, the land of their owne nativity was too little for each to have a part: upon which occaſion a cuſtome was practiſed to baniſh ſome, that the reſt might have roome. Theſe Exiles therefore (chiefely conſiſting of their youth) fell upon other Lands with no leſſe danger, then the falling of a ſword out of the ſheath, and grevouſly wounded whereſoever they fell; but no where more deadly then in England. Which for two hundred, and eightreene yeeres continuance, they unceſſantly aſſaulted; ſometimes harrowing the Countrey before them, and carrying away great Booties to their Ships: ſometimes impoveriſhing the People, by exacting great ſummes of money for compoſition of Peace: ſometimes expelling the Inhabitants, and ſeating themſelves in their places: and ſometimes ſharing the Countrey with their Kings, and taking unto themſelves none of the worſt; but not as other Conquerors, to build, ſow, and plant, but to lay waſt, caſt downe, and deſtroy, ſparing neither Erections for civill uſe, nor places of Oratory dedicated to divine. Yet the Garland once gotten by their King Canut, was worne with great glory, and by three of thoſe Danish Kings, Englands Crowne was enjoyed. The firſt of them Potent, religious, wiſe, and juſt. The ſecond, illegimare, an uſurper very agill, but idle: And the third a Tyrant, a Taxe-raiſer, laſcivious, and a glutton, in which exceſſe at Lambeth hee ſuddainely ended his life, when the Land became cleared of the Danes ſore oppreſſions, after they had a long time attempted, and their Kings for five, and twenty yeeres ſpace worne the royall diademe of this Realme.

(6) Theſe foure Nations fulfilling their times by Heavens aſſignement, in gaining, keeping, and againe looſing, the rich Garland of GREAT BRITAINES government: a firſt, inferiour to none, made thereunto a double claime, and by a third (more ſure then both) which was, their conquering ſword, got it. Theſe laſt (which I pray may be laſt) were the Normans, a people fierce, and valorous, whoſe many Sea-adventures were ſo great, in the daies of Charles the Great, as that he wept to fore-ſee the harmes they would doe to his in France, which proved ſo many, that Charles the Bald (his Grand-Child) was forced to part with the Earledome of Charters unto Haſting Norman; Charles the Groſſe with the Country Menſtria, unto Godfrey their Chieftaine, and Charles the ſimple, with all the Countryes which lay betwixt the River Seine, and Loyre, unto Rollo their Leader, whereof hee became Duke, and that Dutchie from him named Normandy. Whence William the Baſtard the ſeventh in diſcent, in a bloody field at Battell in Suſſex, wan the Engliſh Crowne from King Harold that held it; when, by changing of Lawes, diſheriting of Nobles, and beſtowing the Lands Revenewes upon his, hee laid the foundation of a glorious Monarchy. Crowne banded for, among brethren and kindred (as what will not the deſire of a Diademe doe?) the two yonger brethren ſucceſſively wearing it, to the prejudice of their * Elder, and Stephen having no right, but ſuch as Intruders pretend. But Henrie Plantagenet placed on the Throne, and three hundred thirty one yeeres taken up in the Raignes of foureteene Kings of his line, their Acts afford matter of more Princely conſequence, their Dominions ſpread wider, themſelves being the lawfull Inheritors to the third part of France, and to the Whole by the Title of their third Edward, and by the Conqueſt of their fifth Henry. And ſurely had not the civill diſſentions of Lancaſter and Yorke ſpent their weapons in the wounds of themſelves, thoſe Kings and their Succeſſours undoubtedly had beene double crowned even to this day. But theſe Roſes pluckt off by diſſentions hands, and their branches torne downe in home-bred broyles, their royall rootes lay as it were dead in the Earth, till Teuder of Lancaſter with Plantagenet of Yorke, gave them vigor and ſappe by binding both together in wedlockes golden band. Whereby alſo the long dead ſtemme of the ancient Britiſh Kings began againe to bud forth, and five renowned Princes of that Sirname ſucceeded in Englands Throne. * The firſt of them, the richeſt, and wiſeſt King of this Weſterne-world: * The Second, the foreſt wonder of the Papall authority; * The third, the forwardeſt in all pious actions. * The fourth the ferventeſt for the Religion of Rome; * And the fifth a Mayden-Queene, the moſt famouſly renowned among the Worlds Monarks, under whoſe raignes one hundred and ſixteen yeeres were fully compleat and run. And were it not that the Engliſh are taxed to be overmuch addicted unto vaine Propheſies, and that Merlins was prohibited by decree of Councell, I might alledge his, and that of Aquila at Shaftesbury, both of them foreſhewing that the Britiſh Empire after the Saxons and Normans, ſhould returne againe to her ancient Stocke and Name. Notwithſtanding Truth bids us acknowledge, how farre God hath accompliſhed both theſe in the royall Perſon of our now-Soveraigne, the one by his diſcent from the loines of that Royall Teuder King Henry the Seventh; and the other, by his Edict, in reſtoring to the Iland her ancient Name, Britannia: himſelfe being the firſt Monarch of the two Kingdomes Vnion, and the greateſt of Command, ſince Cæſius the Dane. The Cordes of whoſe Royall Tents, we pray, may be further extended, that thoſe naked Virginians may be covered under the Curtains of his moſt Chriſtian Government; and that the Scepter of his Peace may bud, as Aarons Rod in his hand, and in the hand of his Sonne, and Son Sonnes, ſo long as the Sun and Moone endureth.

(7) Theſe then (worthy Reader) are the Heads, whence have iſſued ſuch plentifull Springs, that now met together in one Body, the Streame is grown very bigge, which thing I ever feared, but could never prevent; offending rather with the Niggard who thinketh every mite too-much, then ſinning with the Prodigall in ſuperfluous exceſſe; ſo plenteous is our Story, and ſo largely requires it to be writ. Through all which my weake body with many yeares labour hath alone travelled, aſwell in the reveiwing of the Geographical parts of the Land as in the compiling of the ſucceeding Hiſtory, though farre unable to perfect either according to their own worths. But leſt the waight of the whole ſhould reſt upon ſo ſlender a proppe as my ſelfe: I have laid my buildings upon far ſtronger arches, as by the many alleaged authorities may appeare. For firſt, the Chards for the moſt part traced by others, and moſt of them divulged unto view, were the foundations of my begun paines; in ſupplying their wants with my many additions, & dimenſions of the Shire-townes and Cities true platformes. The further deſcriptions of ſundry provinces, I have gleaned from the famous workes of the moſt worthy and learned Cambden, whoſe often ſowed ſeedes in that Soile, hath laſtly brought forth a moſt plenteous harveſt. For the body of the Hiſtory, many were the manuſcripts, notes, and Records, wherewith my honoured and learned friends ſupplied me; but none more (or ſo many) as did the worthy repairer of eating Times ruines, the learned Sir Robert Cotton Knight Banoret, another Philadelphus in preſerving old Monuments and ancient Records: whoſe Cabiners were unlocked, and Library continually ſet open to my free acceſſe; and from whence the chiefeſt garniſhments of this worke have been enlarged and brought: ſuch as are the antique altars, and Trophies in Stone, by him preſerved from periſhing oblivion; the Coines of gold, ſilver, alchymy, and copper, of the Britaines, Romans, Saxons, Danes, and Engliſh, with the Broad Seales of thoſe Kings ſince the ſame were in uſe: all of them ſo followed from the originall moddles, and moneyes, by the moſt exquiſit and curious hand of our age, as any eie may witnes they are the true prints from thoſe ſtamps. The like moſt acceptable helpes, both of Bookes and Collections, (eſpecially in matters remoter from our times) I continually received from that worthy Divine, Maſter John Barkham, a gentleman compoſed of Learning, Vertue and Curteſie, as being no leſſe ingeniouſly willing, then learnedly able, to advance and forward all vertuous endeavours. Laſtly for the matters of Heraldrie, the willing and ready paines of Maſter William Smith, Rough Dragon, (an Officer at Armes) was ever at hand: and by theſe hands this building is mounted to ſuch an height as thou ſeeſt; which thus now finiſhed, this ſcanted Epitome may well ſerve thy foote ſteppes, as ſtaires to aſcend theſe five nationall Stories already finiſhed and lead thee into the ſixth now moſt happily begun. Where from thoſe mounted heights, thou maieſt behold, how Time hath ſquared the Stones of theſe buildings: how Fortune hath varied in contriving the Worke: and how the Fates have erected, poliſhed, and puld downe the ſupporting Pillars of GREAT BRITAINES THEATRE. From whoſe Tarras with David caſt not thy luſting eie upon unlawfull delights: nor with Babels King boaſt, that his was built by thy owne might: But with Moſes confeſſe, that from a ſmall ſtocke (as a graft of the Lords planting) thou art now growen into a great Nation, mighty, and full of people: And with Salomon make ſupplication unto thy great Iehovah, that the Arke of his ſtrength may ever reſt in this Houſe, and his eies bee ever open thereon day and night. With the Prophet pray that this building may be as beauteous as his, the Foundations laid with Saphires, her Windowes with the Emeraudes, and her Gates with the Carbuncles: That the deſarts of this choſen Zion may be as Eden, and her wildernes like the Garden of God, watered in due time with the firſt and latter raine; Deut. 11. 13. her Government Peace, her People the Saints of Salvation, and her Kings the Signets on Gods right hand, ſucceſſively to ſit on this Royall Throne, till Chriſt be the King of Kings ſhall come in the Clowdes, and from the Raine-Bow the Throne of his Majeſty pronounce us bleſſed, and make us heires with himſelfe of that Kingdome which never ſhall have end. Vnto which CHRIST, with his FATHER, and HOLY SPIRIT, three in Perſons, but ONE GOD *eternal, undividible in Deity, be aſcribed all Praiſe, Honour, Glory, Wiſdome, Power and Might for evermore.
